ON MONDAY, August 5, the National Convention of the Progressive Party met at noon in the Coliseum, Chicago, for the purpose of nominating candidates for the presidency and vice-presidency and adopting a platform of principles. It was a large and representative gathering. From all over the country, enthusiastic followers of the new movement were present. From the minute the crowds began to pour into the hall, there was a continuous display of enthusiasm, and many patriotic songs were sung.

Before the convention met there was a suffrage parade and the great army of women who marched were cheered as they entered the Coliseum. Conspicuous among them was Miss Jane Addams of the Hull House Settlement. There were many women of wealth in the audience, fashionably dressed, and there was also a strong representation of working-women in shirtwaists. Roosevelt emblems, and especially the red bandanna, were in abundant evidence.

There were about 1,200 delegates in their seats when the convention was called to order by Senator Dixon, who briefly outlined the circumstances attending the birth of the new party. The convention call was read by Oscar King Davis. Pictures of Washington, Lincoln, Jefferson and Hamilton were hung across the platform end of the hall, and at the farther end was a large portrait of Roosevelt, the founder of the new party. The entire gathering was estimated at between 10,000 and 12,000 persons.

During the reading of the call, when Senator Dixon spoke the names of the signers of the document, there was loud cheering by the members of the different State delegations. Rev. Mr. Dornblazer of the German Lutheran Church made the opening prayer. The band then played "America," the entire audience singing.

Senator Beveridge of Indiana was selected as temporary chairman of the convention and was escorted to the platform by Governor Johnson of California, Governor Vessey of South Dakota, Carey of Wyoming, and Hon. Frank H. Funk, Progressive candidate for governor of Illinois. On taking the chair, the Senator made a ringing address, which kept the floor and galleries cheering. He denounced the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust decisions of the Supreme Court and the general corruption prevailing in the old parties. He stated the principles of the new party and dwelt on its opposition to the boss system and the special interests. The people were tired of mock reforms. He made a special plea to Southern Democrats to rally to the support of Progressivism. He said the new movement would abolish child labor, plan old-age pensions and favor woman suffrage.

At the close of the first day's proceedings, the party leaders met to consider the choice of a running mate for Colonel Roosevelt, and it was agreed that the most favorable man was Governor Hiram Johnson of California. Mr. Roosevelt, it was stated, personally favored a Southern Democrat.

A subject of considerable discussion was Mr. Roosevelt's stand on the negro delegate question, and although some of the members of the National Committee opposed him at the outset, his strong arguments finally broke down all opposition.

On assembling for the second day's session, the crowds were even larger than on Monday, in expectation of the promised speech of Mr. Roosevelt. The first business before the convention was the report of the credentials committee, after which a permanent organization was effected, Judge Ben B. Lindsey of Colorado being elected permanent chairman.

Colonel Roosevelt then made his first appearance on the convention platform, being the only occasion on which a presidential candidate has taken such a step. The Coliseum was crowded to the doors when he began his address at one o'clock P.M. Mrs. Roosevelt sat in a box not far from the platform. There was a wild outbreak of cheering and waving of hats as the Colonel came forward, waving his hat with the rest. For nearly half an hour the fervid jubilation lasted; then the delegates, completely carried away by the enthusiasm, began marching around the hall, waving their standards and singing the "Battle Hymn of the Republic." There was a great crowd of women on the platform, adding to the picturesqueness of the scene.

In his speech, which contained 18,000 words, Colonel Roosevelt declared himself in favor of preferential primaries in presidential years; election of United States Senators by popular vote; the short ballot, limiting the number of officials to be voted for; a stringent and efficient corrupt practices act, applying to primaries as well as elections; publicity of campaign contributions; initiative, referendum and recall; recall of judicial decisions; simplifying the process for amendment of the constitution; strengthening of the pure food law; establishment of a National Health Department; social and industrial justice to wage workers, including a minimum wage; insurance and old-age pensions; regulation of conditions of labor; prohibition of child labor; federal control of trusts; a National Industrial Commission, controlling all interstate industry; revision of the tariff in the interest of employee and consumer; a permanent tariff commission, non-partisan; land monopoly tax; suffrage for women; regulation of hearing in contempt cases; internal waterway improvements; reform of the currency to give greater elasticity; conservation of forests, mines, water power; development and control of the Mississippi River; government ownership of Alaska railroads; leasing system for Alaska coal fields; a larger navy; fortification of the Panama Canal and strict observance of the canal treaty.

During the address, a Georgian delegate interrupted to ask him how he stood on the negro question. Mr. Roosevelt replied promptly that he wanted to see intelligent and educated negroes come to the front, but not the bribable type he had seen not only in the last convention but in national conventions for many years.

The concluding passage of his speech was as follows:

> Surely there never was a fight better worth making than the one in which we are engaged. It little matters what befalls any one of us who for the time being stand in the forefront of the battle. I hope we shall win, and I believe that if we can wake the people to what the fight really means we shall win. But, win or lose, we shall not falter. Whatever fate may at the moment overtake any of us, the movement itself will not stop. Our cause is based on the eternal principles of righteousness; and even though we who now lead may for the time fail, in the end the cause itself shall triumph.
> "We stand at Armageddon, and we battle for the Lord."

The convention then adjourned until 10 A.M. Wednesday.

At the closing session on August 7, the greatest harmony prevailed. There was some delay about the preparations of the platform, to which great care had been given by the committee. When completed, it contained about five thousand words. To a large extent it was foreshadowed in Mr. Roosevelt's speech of the previous day. It is a dignified and serious document. The name of the Progressive Party is adopted for the new movement; the old parties are arraigned for their failure to represent the interests of the people and for their corrupt alliances with selfish interests. Among the reforms advocated in the platform are practically all that were enumerated in the speech of Mr. Roosevelt, especially presidential primaries, election of Senators by the people, the initiative, referendum and recall, laws to better the conditions of labor, the establishment of a Department of Labor with a representative in the Cabinet, restriction of the powers of the courts and placing them under the control of the people, the re-establishment of the Country Life Commission, a Federal Commission to supervise industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce, a protective tariff, downward revision and a "non-partisan scientific Tariff Commission" to study the whole subject, supervision over investments to prevent the exploiting of worthless properties and swindling of the people, better protection of immigrants, conservation of natural resources, good roads, an official inquiry into the high cost of living and suitable remedial legislation, the establishment of a national health service, sound progressive laws for the protection and encouragement of legitimate business, a strong national regulation of interstate corporations, equal suffrage for both sexes, publicity for campaign contributions and expenditures, and the creation of a parcels post. It contains a strong appeal to the conscience of the people and for their support of the new party, "born of the nation's awakened sense of justice," next November.

Four women were added to the National Committee as members-at-large. It was two o'clock when the nominations were reached. William Prendergast, of New York, presented the name of Theodore Roosevelt for President, declaring him to be the "man courageous" of American politics and "a national asset." There was another scene of wild enthusiasm, delegations marching, the band playing, and the whole vast audience singing the "Battle Hymn" and "America." Judge Ben B. Lindsey of Colorado seconded the nomination and Miss Jane Addams followed in a short speech in support of the candidate. When she had finished, a banner with the words "Votes for Women" was carried up through the aisles amid great cheering. There were several other seconding speeches. The calling of the roll of States was dispensed with and Chairman Beveridge called for a viva voce vote, which was answered with a tremendous reverberating chorus of "Ayes" and Theodore Roosevelt was then declared the unanimous nominee of the convention.

Governor Hiram W. Johnson of California was unanimously nominated for Vice-President. The usual formal votes of thanks to officers of the convention were passed, after which the nominees stood side by side on the platform and made brief addresses of acceptance. Once more the great audience lifted its voice in song and the Doxology resounded through the Auditorium. When the last notes had died away, Rev. Dr. Johnstone Myers (Baptist) pronounced the benediction, the band played "Home, Sweet Home," and the first National Convention of the Progressive Party was at an end.

KEEPING THE FARMER AT HOME

A Typical New Homestead in the Recently Opened Portion of Northwestern Montana

LEADING officials of the United States Government believe that they have found a way to keep American settlers at home. The great majority of American farmers and homesteaders who have in recent years moved to Canada have not gone through any dissatisfaction or loss of patriotism. In nine cases out of ten the migrations to the Dominion have been prompted by the prospect of material advantages. Farmers have been attracted by the opportunity to sell out their holdings in the United States at favorable prices and then reinvest in similar farms in the newer provinces of Canada at a fraction of the sum received in each instance for the American farm, thereby leaving the tiller of the soil a splendid "nest egg" for his trouble in moving. Similarly, men and women who are ambitious to become homesteaders have in many instances been influenced in favor of Canada by the fact that it has been easier for a person with small capital to secure a farm in Canada than in the United States.

With an intimate knowledge of just what has induced the stampede to Canada, our Federal officials, backed by the hearty co-operation of Congress, have adopted two means of turning the tide of settlers. For one thing, Uncle Sam is setting about correcting the false impression which has gone forth to the effect that there is no desirable public land remaining for settlers in this country. This popular belief that the public domain is exhausted is very far from the truth. Not a year passes but sees the opening to settlement of some of the finest farming land in the world. The government is constantly purchasing land from the Indians and throwing it open to settlement on the homestead plan, and the vast irrigating projects of the United States Reclamation Service are transforming arid regions into garden spots of marvelous productiveness. Furthermore, the continual extension of railroads and other transportation lines in the West is all the while giving sudden value to homestead land that was decidedly unpromising before such improvement was commenced.

The second means that has been adopted for keeping American homesteaders at home is found in a new law which greatly simplifies the winning of a farm. It has been realized for some time past that the conditions under which the Federal authorities sold slices of the public domain to bona fide settlers were not as favorable to the purchasers as they might be, and so Congress was induced at its present session to pass a new homestead law which has been duly signed by the President, and which reduces the requirements. The new law is commonly known as the Three-Year Homestead Law, because under it the period of residence necessary in order to entitle a person to patent under the homestead laws is reduced from five to three years, and the period within which a homestead entry may be completed is reduced from seven to five years.

Public land is sold to homesteaders in consideration of their agreement to improve the property and cultivate the land. Formerly no specific amount of cultivation was required respecting a homestead entry made under the general law—an entry for 160 acres—but the United States Land Office was wont to require a considerable portion of a tract to be cultivated before a person could gain title to his holding. The new law says in so many words that not less than one-eighth of the area of any homestead holding must be cultivated, and this stipulation will reduce by at least one-half the amount of cultivation of agricultural crops previously required. But, owing to the liberal reduction in the period of residence, the new law requires that there shall be actual cultivation. A mere breaking of the soil will no longer suffice. Henceforth, the homesteader must plant or sow seed and must till for a crop other than native grasses. Under the new law a homestead entryman must establish an actual residence on his land within six months after the date of entry, but after establishing a residence he is permitted to be absent from the land for one continuous period of not more than five months each year. The new homestead law and the general agitation in favor of American settlers remaining at home has greatly quickened popular interest in the vacant lands of the United States. Many persons will doubtless be surprised to learn that there is to-day in this country a total of considerably more than half a billion acres of public land, unappropriated and unreserved, and much of which has never been surveyed. In some counties where public land is reported, the vacant areas total only a few acres, but there are not less than twenty-six States that have vacant public lands. Some of the Western States have twenty to thirty million acres apiece waiting settlers, and from that the State totals scale downward until at the foot of the list we find Missouri with little more than one thousand acres remaining undisposed of when the government compiled its latest statistics.

There is no land for the homesteader in New England or in the Atlantic Coast States north of Florida. We heard more or less a few years ago of the "abandoned farms" of New England, but these were not, of course, in any sense public lands under the national government, and anyway these farms have been pretty well taken up as a result of more scientific farming methods of the "back to the farm" movement and the popular desire of the well-to-do classes for country homes in New England. Nor is there any public land in what are commonly known as the Central States—the Middle West of yesterday if not of to-day—nor indeed in any Northern State east of the Mississippi with the exception of Michigan and Wisconsin.

In the South, however, particularly in the Gulf States, there are hundreds of thousands of acres of vacant public land. To be sure, a considerable proportion of this Southern territory is low, swampy or marshy land, but the "new South" is wrestling in earnest with the problem of draining her swamps and it is believable that in time she will, by this means, add tremendously to her productive areas, just as, to go to the opposite extreme, irrigation is reclaiming the deserts of the West. Meanwhile the development of perfected machinery for taking the cypress trees from the Southern swamps is bestowing upon this lately worthless land a tangible value, even without thought of what the future may hold when the receding waters have exposed a tremendously fertile soil.

Arizona, one of our newest States, has nearly two score million acres of undistributed land. Most of it is either arid or mountainous, but there are some grazing and timber lands. Arkansas has close to half a million acres subject to entry under the homestead laws, and there is much of it that the government officials designate as productive, mountainous or timbered. Despite the rush to California in years gone by, there are more than a score of million acres in that State that have not yet been spoken for. Some of this land is located in the mountains, but there is quite a representation of agricultural and grazing land. Colorado has almost as much undisposed of territory as has California. In point of acreage, Michigan is in about the same class as Kansas, but the Peninsular State makes a stronger bid for the homesteader because some of her unoccupied land is classed by the Federal authorities as "good farming land." Montana ranks among the three or four foremost States when it comes to accounting the public domain. She has considerably more than thirty million acres on the bargain counter, and much of it awaits only the plow and the seed.

The Sacred Splendor of Youth

A Sermon

BY

Rev. Chas. M. Sheldon, D.D.*

TEXT: "Let no man despise thy youth: but be thou an ensample to them that believe, in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity." I. Tim. 4: 12, R. V.

BENJAMIN DISRAELI, in his book, Coningsby, says: "Youth is a blunder, manhood a struggle, old age a regret." That is the undisguised statement of a pessimist. But Paul, although he was an old man at the time he wrote this letter to Timothy, and had experienced enough to make a dozen men pessimists, wrote to his young friend in a most exultant series of exhortations, reminding Timothy in almost every sentence of the fact that he had a very great life to live and that the time for him to live it was the present. "Youth," he says in this letter, "is of all times in life the one splendid exercising time. It is a sacred trust. It is consecrated energy. It is of all periods in life the one most fragrant and the one to be treated with the greatest reverence."

It is well for us to remind ourselves not infrequently of the historical fact that some of the greatest achievements in the world have been made by youth, and it will always be so in human history. David had experienced some of the greatest emotions before he was twenty and was a king at the age of eighteen. Raphael had practically completed his life work at the age of thirty-seven. He did no great artistic work after that age. James Watt even as a boy as he watched the steam coming out of the teakettle saw in it the new world of mechanical power made possible by the old element turned and driven by a simple appliance. Cortes was master of Mexico before he was thirty-six. Schubert died at the age of thirty-one, after having composed what may perhaps be called in some ways the most entrancing melody ever written. Charlemagne was master of France and the greatest emperor of the world at the age of thirty. Shelley wrote Queen Mab when he was only twenty-one, and was a master of poetry before he was twenty-five. Patrick Henry was able to shape the revolutionary history of a new country before he was thirty and astonish the world by his oratory before he was twenty-six years old. At the age of twenty-four Ruskin had written Modern Painters, and Bryant while still a boy of high school age had written Thanatopsis. The list of achievements of youth in all ages—in all departments of activity—is endless.

What Jesus' Preparation Meant

The most conspicuous example of the splendor of youth is found in the person of Jesus Christ. There is no parallel in history to this personal achievement. We have in the first place an astonishing period of absolute silence concerning eighteen years. All we know about those years is contained in the fact that he went home from the meeting with the doctors in the temple at Jerusalem and was subject to his father and mother. There is no question that during those eighteen years spent in the undramatic and homely acts of a common carpenter in a little country town he was preparing himself mentally and morally for what we call his great life work; but we must not forget that the preparatory years of youth for life work are as important as the work itself. In fact we may as well remember that no great work is ever done without great preparation. If you had fifteen years to live and knew you had only fifteen, it would be the wisest thing you could do to spend ten of them getting ready for the last five. Here was the Master of Life who spent eighteen years getting ready for two and a half. Within that two and a half years what momentous events were crowded! We have the record of the tremendous expenditure of vital force continued through a succession of public appearances. We have the record of great public speeches, of great conferences held with multitudes of people, of a personal impression made upon a group of men so powerful that nothing was able to stamp it out. Neither the fact of obscurity on the part of the men who reproduced Christianity, neither the fact of the crucifixion of their leader, the martyrdom of thousands of his followers, the scorn and contempt of a whole empire, the indifference and antagonism of a whole world could keep the peasant of Nazareth, the carpenter, from becoming the King of kings and Lord of lords, in his sway over the world's history.

Can you name any young life in history which for actual results in the way of shaping and creating new forms of human activity can equal the influence of Jesus? And it was all done within a period of time so brief that it seems the greatest miracle of all the ages when we stop to think of it. But in the matters of purity, sinlessness of conduct, absolute fidelity to truth, most commanding courage, the most stupendous optimism, the finest love of the multitude, absolute lack of exclusiveness and aristocracy, Jesus Christ set the example for all young life for all time to come. There has never been his equal and never will be his superior.

But the sacred splendor of youth is a special period of life which stands out by itself in unique fashion and deserves special mention and calls for special thought on the part of those who might make shipwreck of the fair vessel of life owing to some mistaken ideas concerning the period of youth. Some of these mistakes have become almost axiomatic, as, for example, the idea that often has prevailed that youth is a time for anything except serious things; that it is mostly playtime and that the serious things of life are to be undertaken after one has exhausted the play period.

Paul's Advice to Youth

It is exceedingly interesting to note the things which Paul enumerates to Timothy in the list which he gives where he says Timothy ought to be an example to others. "Let no man despise thy youth," he says, "but be thou an example to those that believe"—that is, to the very good people or to those who have made a profession of Christianity. They should be the first and strictest to measure you.

"Be thou an example," he says, "in word."

Common custom almost agrees to forgive and excuse any kind of conversation among young people. Why should they be careful about what they say? Let them rattle on and say anything. They are young people.

"Be an example," he says, "in manner of life."

That covers nearly everything. Habits, daily conduct, enthusiasm, the purposes of life, its ambitions, its hopes, its desires. It covers the widest possible range of example. "Be thou an example in love," the most sacred experience of youth in its courtship, in its sympathy, in its sense of brotherhood. Yet how often we hear excuses made for young men and women that they cannot comprehend the meaning of democracy and how seldom we feel like condemning that attitude which favors the clique of the little circle in the school or university. We think perhaps the sense of brotherhood will grow upon a man as he gets older and that after a while he will come to a place where his race prejudice will disappear, where he can look out upon the multitude and have compassion upon it; but we do not ordinarily ascribe to youth so large a quality as democracy, and say it is a period when exclusion and aristocracy are natural. Do you remember how rare a sight it was when a young man not yet twenty-five invited into his family circle from his university six different nationalities and entertained them in brotherly fashion, holding out his hand of friendship to them? If you read that story, you were astonished not so much at the thing itself as by the fact that it was done by a young person. But why not? Paul says to Timothy, "Be an example to those in affection, in democracy, and brotherhood."

The Period of Doubt

"Be an example in faith."

Youth is the period for criticism and for religious doubts and skepticism. It is not the period for holding on to the treasures that were sacred in the home. It is the time for dispute and argument, for seeking eagerly after new things, new beliefs. As one young man said to another just leaving the lecture room in a great university, "That settles the question of the resurrection for me." "Why?" "Why, didn't the professor say there wasn't any?" "But have you argued it out?" "No. Why should I argue it out? What are professors for but to tell us what the newest discoveries in science are?"

We would not feel surprised if youth, as we s[ee] in its search after new ways of thinking sometim[es] regarded its beliefs as of little importance. I[n] Paul bids Timothy to be an example in faith, as [if] youth were actually a period when one could ma[ke] up his own mind and be his own man, and wh[at] faith is of any value unless it is your own? Do y[ou] believe something simply because some one e[lse] says so or disbelieve it simply because some one e[lse] says so? How far is your faith your own faith a[nd] not the faith of some book or some argument wh[ich] you have never really tested? Youth should ha[ve] enough regard for its own sacredness to stand [up] for its own rights, especially in matters of religi[on], and should use its own plummet, the tests of its o[wn] experience, before it throws overboard the mea[ns] of its own salvation.

"And be thou an example," Paul says, "[in] purity."

What commoner error has been sown over t[he] world broadcast than the error that impurity [is] more or less excusable in youth? There is so[me] excuse, we say, for their action. They are [so] young.

Of all heresies and of all falsehoods which ha[ve] been damning the world in its thought of life, the[re] is none which has been more fearful in its con[se]quences than this. Of all times in life youth is t[he] time for purity, not impurity. One should shri[nk] back with horror as he sees the splendor of you[th] drawing near to the bottomless pit and eage[rly] ready to plunge into its black and foul current. [If] there is anything which any young man or wom[an] can give to the world in the way of service which [is] a splendid gift to succeeding generations it is t[he] example of an unsoiled life, and to say that the[re] is any reasonable excuse for any youth to yield [to] physical passions simply because of youth, is [to] condemn the sacred splendor of a thing which w[as] meant to be kept inviolate from the time it was fi[rst] born; and the youth himself, as he thinks upon t[he] vast consequences which flow from the yielding [to] temptation, ought to call up reserves of physic[al], mental and spiritual power and realize the sacr[ed] calls imposed by the Divine Being when he cons[ti]tuted such power and gave it birth. There is [no] reasonable excuse for youth to throw away [its] jewel or repudiate the clear-eyed gift of the Divi[ne] Being because the energy which could be exercis[ed] helpfully in work has been vitiated and diseas[ed] and distorted by misuse.

Youth's Enthusiasm

The sacred splendor of youth shines brighte[st] and strongest in the great realm of religion a[nd] human service. There are three qualities whi[ch] youth at its best always possesses—energy, inclin[a]tion and enthusiasm. In the nature of the ca[se] as men grow older in mind and body they lose t[he] first flush of their enthusiasm. The inclination [to] take up and initiate great reforms, to underta[ke] apparent impossibilities, belongs naturally to t[he] youth time of life; and if anything should have f[ull] sway it is the religious instinct and purpose. "R[e]member now thy Creator in the days of thy youth" is an exhortation perfectly natural because youth [is] the time for the exuberance of religious vitalit[y] for the crusade which every age demands even [of] its boys and girls in the march, not to resc[ue] the Holy Sepulcher from the hands of the infide[l] but to plant the cross above the resurrection. [If] there was ever a false thing spoken or thought [in] this world it was the assertion made a few yea[rs] ago that the religious life precludes the exercise [of] the finest instincts of young men and women; a[nd] that religion might be well enough for the closin[g] years of men's and women's lives but had litt[le] place in the life of any man who must be occupi[ed] with great things like science and invention a[nd] progress. This assertion, made by one who call[s] himself a scientist, is an exact contradiction of s[o] the human facts in the case. No religious enthus[i]asm has ever been able to equal that of the you[th] who have, without counting the cost, given ther[n]selves heart and soul and body to the service [of] od; and the world demands more an anything else of every young an and woman this kind of service.

The one thing which the universe eeds to-day is a religious passion.
he world is not suffering for more eamships like the Titanic to be uilt, upon which are lavished the ealth of invention and luxury and l sorts of physical skill in the way machinery equipment and scientific ppliances. The world could get along, ithout any loss whatever, without ch productions, but what the world in crying need of is a youth filled ith a tremendous passion for reeeming life from its stupidity—its upidity of sin, from its enormous elfishness, from its cruel greed, from s corroding lust, and its tireless earch for pleasure at the expense of ower. What this city needs is not ore science spent on its buildings, ot more money spent on its amuse-ents, but just plain righteousness, onest dealing between man and an, living wages paid to those who abor, clean homes, which are only ossible where there is religion. And e time to create and set in motion is righteousness is for the youth me of life. If young men and omen are not religious in the deep-st sense, their education is lacking in ne one thing needful.

"Though I have all knowledge," says aul, "and have not love, I am nothg." That is, love to God and man, hich is the creed of religion. It is ne saddest thing in all the world to ee a young life equipped with every race of mind and body and destitute f religion

Youth is not simply great in its bility to plan. It is not wonderful imply in its powers of endurance.
t is not fascinating because it can ccomplish great things with tireless nergy. It is not a thing to be ad-ired because it has simply within it ossibilities for all kinds of expresion in artistic ways; but youth is the reatest time in life because of its acredness. It is the time when the est and the noblest and the richest nd sweetest are possible; the joyful ecognition of a divine Fatherhood is what makes youth time so splendid.
he mockery of all life is to take the est we have and throw it away, or ive it to unworthy purposes, or oard it up to ourselves until it is of o value. The most splendid sight in he world is to see youth dedicating tself to the greatest uses. The high-st standards, the greatest enthusi-sms, the noblest incentives come in outh. They are not vain dreams or maginings: they are the promptings f a divine inspiration. Unheeded, hey will pass, and you will look in ain for them to come back when you re old. The greatest religious waves f power sweep over young life between eighteen and thirty years of age. After this last age has passed, he chances, as we say, are vastly against any religious vision. God in some mysterious but real way chooses o reveal himself in his greatest power to the young life of humanity.
If one who catches this vision remains true to it, he will indeed make the most of life."

NEW STYLES AND OLD ONES

IN GOLDSMITH'S She Stoops to Conquer, old Mrs. Hardcastle exclaims, "I hate old-fashioned trumpery." "And I love it," replies Hardcastle. "I love everything that's old: old friends, old times, old manners, old books," etc. Certainly the change of the old for the new is almost as profitless in some cases to-day as it was when the housemaid in Aladdin's palace ran out with an old lamp to exchange it with the man who went through the streets crying, "New lamps for old ones."

The "old-fashioned trumpery" of our grandfathers was often very plain and very cheap, but it gave more satisfaction then than much of the new-style gewgaws of to-day which represent the fondness for show and the desperate effort to keep up appearances.

An elderly millionaire of New York who died the other day left among his immediate personal effects "a $5 watch, a pair of cuff buttons valued at $10 and a ring worth $15." Quite in keeping with the unostentatious simplicity and modesty of old-time captains of industry; quite in contrast with the lavish and often senseless display of many modern millionaires.

Utility and comfort used to be the standards by which expenditures were measured. Economy was as natural to the man of large property as it was to the man whose small income compelled him to be careful of his outlay. In just this old-time habit of thrift were laid the foundations of many of the colossal fortunes of the present day. Yet what real comfort and what a genuine atmosphere of home distinguished the old homesteads of our grandfathers! Increase of wealth did not destroy their simple, hearty manner of living. Their lives were more unselfish, more wholesome than some of those who followed them.

That good old-fashioned word, "homestead," is fast becoming obsolete, because the good, old-fashioned homestead itself is becoming a thing of the past. Now the millionaire has his "city house" and his "country place," or his "palace on Riverside," and he moves restlessly with his family from one to another in the intervals between European trips and "seasons" at Newport or Palm Beach. The poorer man with an ambitious family strives to keep up appearances in a modern "cottage" in some new-fashioned suburb, or in an up-to-date "apartment" in the city. His movings, though more restricted, are perhaps as restless and as frequent as those of the rich man whom he and his family envy. Thus home spirit suffers, and the joys and solid comforts of the old-fashioned homestead are unknown.

COST of living is the immediate problem of the day. Political parties are presenting plans for its solution. Tariff is blamed for its existence. Trusts are accused of creating it. Everybody and everything is supposed to be in the conspiracy except the persons directly affected. Where do we find the people recognizing their own part of the responsibility and trying to find part of the cure in changing their own manner of life?

False standards of life and new-fashioned demands and indulgences have more to do with the high cost of living than most of us realize. A few months ago one of the New York newspapers printed a series of cartoons under the caption, "We could live as cheaply as our fathers if we would do as they did instead of the way we do to-day." One picture showed the family of the old times picnicking and bathing at the riverside, in good rustic enjoyment. Another picture showed, by way of contrast, the present day family at the stylish seaside resort, where a uniformed attendant pushed the roller chair along the board walk at "a dollar a minute." Other pictures showed the contrast between the making over of "papa's pants" to fit his boy, and the new-style tailor measuring the young hopeful of to-day for a sporty suit, while he remarks, between cigarette puffs, "I don't care so much about their wearing as I do to have 'em look right." It is easy to imagine other pictures of the series. They were more truthful than ridiculous.

THE constant effort to keep up appearances, to make a show, to do as others do, to buy the latest styles, to indulge in the up-to-date appliances and pleasures—these things have the most direct and vital relation to the high cost of living. The wage earner and the salary earner must have the player-piano and talking machine in his home, even on instalment payments. New records require constant expenditures. The set of books in handsome bindings has been forced upon him because they cost "only a dollar a month." If his salary can stand it, he must have an automobile. Sometimes a mortgage on the house that the neighbors will not see is not too high a price to pay for an automobile that the neighbors will see. With such indulgences, the cost of meat and milk become very burdensome, and one cent a pound, or a quart, increase in price of these necessities is a household burden worse than the addition of a ten-dollar-a-month instalment on the things that help in keeping up appearances. These little steady increases in prices may be unfair and needless, but the millionaire captains of industry also must maintain their new-style manner of living; and palaces, yachts, hunting trips, weddings, and the like make a terrific drain upon their income. The wage earners and the dividend earners all want to increase their incomes to meet the increased "cost of living" and to enable them to keep up appearances in their own respective ways.

GETTING and spending are the most natural aims of active life. We all want to get as much as possible, and few of us are misers. It is pleasant to spend, whether it be money, or strength, or talent. All the difference rests in the kind of spending that gives us the most satisfaction. Money or effort spent solely for self-indulgence or for the sake of keeping up appearances pays the poorest dividends. Even in this life the dividends are mean and unsatisfying. In the life to come the investment represents nothing but bankruptcy, hopeless and everlasting.

None are so happy or so richly rewarded as those who put their money and their talents into simple, helpful, unostentatious service of love. The old-fashioned way of Him who had not where to lay his head, yet who went about doing good, is the way which brings real pleasure and contentment and which is least hindered by the "high cost of living." Appearances do not count. To be and not to seem is the rule of the genuine, wholesome, helpful life.

ABSENT

TWILIGHT, and evening star,
And one last word to thee;
Sweet one, I know so truly
How dear thou art to me.
When thou art here beside me,
My heart and soul are thine;
When thou art gone, beloved,
No love compares with mine.

Dawning, the light of day
That creeps o'er yonder hill
Fills me with silent wonder,
And tears my heart do fill.
For thou art gone, 'tis silent;
I wake ere morn's first call;
O love, I know He'll guide thee,
The God who loves us all.

Noontide, with wondering eyes,
I search the mist beyond,
Thinking my eyes may see thee,
And know where thou art gone.
Beyond the dim horizon
A last long look I take;
Then, sleeping, dream I see thee
Return at morning break.

Sheep in Central Park

ROMANCE wherever we find it is a matter of contrasts, whether it be a story of love in the midst of strange and hazardous surroundings or a simple wayside scene that presents some striking, unexpected feature. Perhaps nowhere do we get a better example of this than at the edge of the sheepfold in Central Park, New York City. Here one finds the sheep pursuing the even tenor of their existence and serving admirably the purpose for which they were placed in the park, that of keeping the grass nibbled down to a lawn like velvet. The strange and striking part of the picture is that as one lifts his eyes from the age-old simplicity of the contented flock of sheep, his vision passes to a number of the world's most outstanding examples of the complexity and luxury that man has built up for himself. Only a few blocks away the subway roars its way underground. In the other direction the elevated railway passes through those districts of the city which represent the very farthest call from the simplicity of the scene before him, and in the distance the Hotel Plaza, one of the largest and most luxuriant hostelries of the world, looks out upon all these contrasts of the poverty and wealth, the rush and the leisure, the peace and the strife of the great city.

SHOULD "NE TEMERE" BE REPEALED?

BY PROFESSOR W. H. T. DAU

Concordia Seminary, St. Louis, Mo.

SIX years ago a papal decree was published which declares any betrothal or marriage entered into by a Catholic with a Catholic, or by a Catholic with a non-Catholic, to be valid only on condition that either the betrothal or the marriage take place in the presence and with the sanction of a Catholic priest. This decree is known as the Ne Temere decree. It is called thus according to a custom prevailing in the Catholic Church, by which the official deliverances of its Popes are cited by giving the initial word, or words, of such a deliverance. The two Latin terms Ne Temere are a warning against reckless action, and the reckless action intended is the one indicated above.

We quote a few statements from the Ne Temere decree, from the work of Dr. Leitner of Passau, which was issued in its fifth edition at Regensburg in 1908. Dr. Leitner is a Catholic professor at Passau and bears the title "Doctor of Theology and of Canon Law." Dr. Leitner's book is in German: Die Verlobungs- und Eheschliessungsform nach dem Dekrete Ne Temere, which means, "The Form of Betrothal and Marriage according to the Ne Temere Decree." Throughout his book the author cites the original language of the papal deliverance. The decree reaffirms, in the first place, the decree of the Council of Trent, to this effect: "The Holy Congregation declares any person who dares to enter into the estate of matrimony, except upon license from the parish priest or of some other priest of the same parish, or of the ordinary and of two or three witnesses, incapacitated for such a contract, and contracts of this kind are declared null and void." (p. 9.) We shall append the original Latin text in footnotes.*

Regarding betrothals the decree declares: "Only such betrothals are regarded as valid and efficacious according to the law of the church, as are set down in a document signed by the contracting parties and by the parish priest, or the local ordinary, and by at least two witnesses."†

Regarding marriage the decree hands down the following ruling: "Only such marriages are valid as are entered into in the presence of the parish priest, or the local ordinary, or of a priest delegated for the purpose by either of these, and of two witnesses."‡ Again: "To the above laws are amenable all persons baptized in the Catholic Church, also all who have joined the Catholic Church from errorist or schismatic societies (notwithstanding either the former or the latter have apostatized later) whenever they entered into betrothal or matrimony."† Lastly: "The same laws apply to the aforenamed Catholics whenever they enter into betrothal or matrimony with non-Catholics, baptized or not, even when they have obtained a dispensation from the obstacle of a mixed religion or of a disparity of cult; except the Holy See decrees otherwise for a certain place or locality."‡

From the operations of the Ne Temere decree Germany was at once exempted by the Apostolic Constitution Provida of January 18, 1906. Other countries (e.g., Belgium) secured the same privilege at later dates. In Canada the decree has caused lawsuits. One of them, Morin vs. Le Croix, was tried in Justice Greenshield's court at Montreal, June 21. The judge, in his ruling, said: "No church, be it the powerful Roman Catholic Church, or the equally great and powerful Anglican Catholic Church, possesses any authority to overrule the civil law. Such authority as any church has is given it by the civil law and is subservient to the civil law." (Montreal Daily Witness of June 21, 1912.) The last statement, of course, relates to the authority of any church only as applied in civil affairs. That the Ne Temere decree is being applied in the United States has been plainly shown by the Protestant Magazine of Washington, D. C. (Vol. IV, No. 2). This paper has published a fac-simile of a baptismal certificate for Anna Susanna Dagonya, daughter of Stephen Dagonya, Roman Catholic, and Mary Csoma, Reformed, who were married at Perth Amboy, N. J., August 4, 1909, by Rev. Louis Nannassy, Reformed. Their child was born November 6, 1910, and baptized by Rev. Franc Gross, priest of the Holy Cross Church at Pert Amboy. In writing out the baptismal certifica the priest has stated that the child is illegitima and that the parents are living in concubinage.

An incident like this shows the practical workin of the Ne Temere decree. No one who understanc the teaching of the Roman Church will have an difficulty in locating the real cause of the N Temere decree. It is the logical consequence of th teaching of the Roman Church on matrimon which this church declares a sacrament, and on th priesthood, which, according to this church, alor can perform valid religious acts. One might eve give the Roman Church credit for its relentles cruel consistency as evidenced by the Ne Temer decree. On the other hand, this decree shows th menace which this church constitutes to the civ authorities and to the civil interests of men. In it wanton aggressiveness and grasping after worl power this church shrinks from no extreme. It i difficult to see how the Ne Temere decree, when ap plied according to the plain intent and declaratio of its framer, can fail to become libelous. So fa as it affects the authority of the State, it is riotou and seditious. The consistent Catholic must reb against the civil authority in order to obey hi spiritual ruler. This is a sad and horrible d lemma, but it verily exists, and will become mor grievous as the fell purpose of the Ne Temere de cree is better understood.

The Ne Temere decree is laughed to scorn b every Christian with a conscience enlightened b God's Word. It exercises an influence only on me who do not know "the liberty with which Chris hath made them free," and who are, by their ow choice, subject to a spiritual bondage which the might spurn if they were properly enlightene For the sake of Catholics and their peace of min one might wish that the report of the repeal of th Ne Temere decree were correct. Father Phelan o St. Louis is quoted in the St. Louis Republic of Jul 29 as having said that he has seen the repeal i Acta, the official publication of the Roman Curi published at Rome. Monsignor Lavelle and Cardi nal Farley of New York are quoted by the sam paper as questioning the authenticity of the repor concerning the revoking of the decree. The decre no doubt, should be repealed. It will never b obeyed in the United States. It is a slanderou and mutinous action. But whether repealed o not, Protestant Christianity and enlightened citi zenship in general throughout the United State will simply ignore the decree, or resent and resis its execution.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

Nannakos, or even of St. Paul, but many hundreds of years later, when the Seljukian Turks, the most virile as well as the most artistic of all the Moslems, in the twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, made Konia the capital of the powerful empire of Roum. "The city was then made so splendid," it is said, "with beautiful buildings, palaces, mosques and mausolea, that the proverb arose and lasted long among the Turks, 'See all the world; see Konia.' "

The Seljukian mosques retain much of their ancient glory to the present day. Indeed I saw nothing of comparatively modern interest in all Asia Minor that compared with these splendid temples of the Seljukian dynasty. The greatest mosque of all is that of the Mevlevi Dervishes, which contains the tomb of Hazret Mevalana, the founder of this curious order of Mohammedans usually called the Whirling Dervishes. This great mosque is decorated without and within in the most lavish fashion. The intricate designs of the mosaic work are marvelous in their beautiful lines and patterns. The mosque is hung with magnificent rugs and scores of beautiful lamps in silver and brass, while the tombs of the dervishes who are honored with a resting place beneath the great dome are covered with costly cloths embroidered in a most elaborate fashion. Especially is the tomb of the founder of the order dazzling in its magnificence. It is covered with cloth of gold, which looks almost like a pall of solid gold, and as Hazret Mevalana is buried standing up it is of a peculiar shape for a sarcophagus.

This order of Moslems is of special interest to us because of its approach to the religion of Jesus. Indeed, these dervishes are frequently called "the Protestants of Mohammedanism." Their mosques are covered with tiles of Christian blue rather than Moslem green, and their worship is far more spiritual than that of the average Mohammedan. Yet, as I have said, these are the Whirling Dervishes, and this is the spot where they originated and from which they have spread throughout the Mohammedan world.

We are apt to look upon these Whirlers and Howlers as the most absurd of religionists, yet if we look into their history we find that a spiritual idea underlies their curious practices. Their founder, who was a great admirer of the Psalms of David, had read in the Bible about David's dancing before the Lord. He thought there must be some connection between the physical and spiritual exercises of the poet king, so he and his followers began to dance or whirl, all the time shouting "Allah, Allah, Allah," until, physically exhausted, though rapt, as they believe, in spiritual ecstasy, they could whirl and shout no longer.

Curious crowds of non-Mohammedans in Constantinople and Smyrna and other large places watch the Whirling Dervishes with a derisive smile on their faces and contempt in their hearts, but as I have seen them in the quiet of their own sanctuary, with no gaping crowds looking on, the exercise has seemed to me as serious as a prayer meeting, for the solemn faces of the dervishes indicated that to them, at least, it was no laughing matter, but an act of religious worship.

As I went into the courtyard of these strange devotees the first sight that caught my eye, aside from the splendid minarets and domes of the mosque, was a beautiful fountain from which gushed the pure water for which Konia is famous. Here a solemn dervish in a tall sugarloaf hat of gray and long gray robe took charge of us and conducted us through the mosque. Moreover, he was no ordinary dervish, but a descendant of the prophet himself, as the green band around his tall hat declared. Within he showed us not only the beautiful rugs and lamps and marble chairs, and the magnificent tombs, the head of each crowned with a marble fez, but, most precious of all, a rug from Mecca, that he told us had belonged to Mohammed himself.

But more interesting to the Christian than thes magnificent relics of a decadent civilization were th institutions which promulgate the doctrines an carry out the teachings of St. Paul in Konia, a cit which he has rendered more famous than all th dervishes and kings who ever made it their home Here is "The Apostolic Institute," a flourishin school for Armenian and Greek boys, to which eve the Turks are not averse to sending their sons. Thi was founded by a Christian Armenian, Jenanyan b name, and is carried on to-day by another scholarl Armenian, a graduate of Yale, who with his abl corps of teachers perpetuates the doctrines as wel as the memory of the great apostle in the Apos tolic Institute. Here in Konia, too, has lately bee established an American Christian Hospital an Dispensary, under the charge of Drs. Dodd an Post, two noble, self-sacrificing missionaries. Thei permanent hospital has not yet been built, but a fin site of eleven acres will soon, we trust, contai another monument to American Christian enter prise in the shape of a large and well-equipped hos pital. Besides these Protestant institutions ther are Armenian, Greek Catholic and Roman Catholi churches and schools. Konia is one of the fe places in Asia Minor where the worship of Chris has never been entirely discarded. Such to-day i the city to which St. Paul journeyed nearly nine teen hundred years ago when he had shaken fro his sandals the dust of the city of Antioch. Th great Mevlevi mosques, whose minarets dot the cit in every direction, were not there then, to be sur The wall which surrounded the city was of Roma construction and not of the Seljukian period as th one that we now see. But in many respects th objects that greeted St. Paul's eyes were little dif ferent from those which the modern traveler see Then, as now, the wayfarer in reaching the cit walls passed through beautiful gardens and or chards and vineyards and groves of mulberry tree Then, as now, the twin peaks of St. Philip and S

THE CHURCH OF THE LORD'S PRAYER

SOME time ago there was printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a paragraph concerning "The Little Temple of the Lord's Prayer" in Palestine. Many letters have been received, asking for a more detailed description.

This white memorial church was erected just south of the Church of the Ascension on Mount Olivet in 1865 by the Princess de la Tour Auvergne. It occupies the spot on which all the traditions of the Middle Ages lead us to believe our Lord and Saviour first uttered the model prayer he taught to his disciples, and which has been adopted by all Christendom. Photographs have been made of this beautiful marble house of prayer, its surroundings, interior views, and several of the large tablets containing the prayer (which is given in many tongues) are shown here on this page. The one in English reads:

"Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Amen."

The Cloister of the Church of the Lord's Prayer, Showing Nine of the Tablets

It is stated that the original intention of the princess was to have within the church twenty-four small chambers in which the Lord's Prayer should be written upon large tablets in as many different languages; so that pilgrims of all nationalities and all creeds might there unite in its repetition. Though the object remained unchanged a different plan of carrying it out was evidently adopted, for, as one of the accompanying photographs shows, many of the tablets have been placed in the cloisters of the building. These cloisters are divided from the open interior court of the church by a series of Gothic arches, the pediments of which rest on a massive stone wall about three feet in height. Outside the wall and the arches the dry court lies largely uncared for. Along the wall there runs a narrow white paved path, but sparse grass and tall straggling weeds occupy most of the space. On the shadiest side a few big geraniums and slender trees relieve the glare of the sunshine on the marble. The architecture of the whole interior of the Church of the Lord's Prayer is a plain, almost severe rendering of a modified Gothic style. The exterior presents entirely unornamented walls, a tower of semi-Gothic design, and a dome which is purely Oriental, save for its surmounting cross.

The Church of the Lord's Prayer

Mr. William H. Winton, of Rochester, N. Y. (to whom we are indebted for the photographs and information of this article), writes that the genuineness of the photographs is attested by the American consul at Jerusalem. This is probably the first time that any pictorial presentation has ever been made of the beautiful church in question, concerning which a writer recently said:

"'Our Father which art in heaven,' in every known language, is carved on the walls and columns, and is the only decoration of this supremely lovely place. To see it in the soft opal twilight of the East, or at moonlight, or in the earliest dawn, is to understand the matchless words of the Master translated into marble."

To many it would seem that the idea of such a church must have come to the Princess de la Tour Auvergne as an inspiration. There is no doubt that the prayer was first given in the Aramaic language of the time of Christ in Palestine, though scholarship is agreed that both Matthew and Luke must have chosen to use a version written in Greek rather than depend on their own memories or translations. Yet in spite of this change of the original language the prayer has the wonderful faculty of translating with undiminished force and sublimity into any tongue now spoken or that ever has been spoken by man. It is stated upon the authority of the British and Foreign Bible Society that the Gospel of St. Matthew, and therefore the Lord's Prayer as well, has been translated into five hundred and nine different languages and dialects. It is the universal prayer; the one in which every human being who believes in God can join. There are no other limits to its unique adaptability. Any one who believes in God, no matter what his race or age or creed or condition, can use the Lord's Prayer and use it just in proportion to his belief. The child of the untutored peasant can understand enough of it to make it the expression of his daily needs. The ripest scholar, philosopher and saint cannot exhaust all its possibilities of meaning. "In a few minutes it may be committed to memory; but it is the work of a lifetime to learn it by heart."

MISSIONARY VIEWS OF THE KOREAN TROUBLE

THE more detailed accounts of the trial of the Korean Christians who are accused of the formation of a plot to assassinate Count Terauchi, the Japanese governor general of Korea, and of the implication of a number of well known American missionaries, have produced a most plausible explanation of the affair, though they have not yet cleared it up entirely. The reports sent to a famous New York daily newspaper, having been cabled back to the Tokyo Nichinichi Shimbun, have led that influential paper to attribute the prosecution to an excess of zeal on the part of subordinate officials, and to state that the alleged conspiracy may prove to be merely another case of "much ado about nothing."

The Rev. Dr. Horace G. Underwood, who was one of the first missionaries to go into that country, is now en route to his Korean home, at which he expects to arrive about August 25.

"I do not anticipate any trouble when I return," he said just before his departure, "for I cannot believe that the higher Japanese officials are in league with any of those who seek to destroy the work of the Christian missionaries. There are, at present, more than three hundred thousand Christians in Korea, and when the Japanese took control of the country they found that it was the missionaries who wielded most of the social and some of the political power.

"I do not think there has been any fanaticism behind these persecutions. I attribute the trouble to the resentment of the subordinate officials, who find that the missionaries have prevented them from committing petty offenses which their offices would allow. I cannot say anything more until I get back and see to what extent the printing of the true statement of the situation has affected the attitude of the Japanese. Then I will make a report to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions."

On July 29 a delegation, consisting of Bishop Alpheus W. Wilson of Baltimore, Bishop Warren A. Candler of Atlanta, the Rev. Dr. Frank Mason North, secretary of the New York Church Extension and Missionary Society, the Rev. Dr. Arthur Judson Brown of New York, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, and the Rev. Edmund F. Cooke, secretary of the Foreign Board of Missions, called on President Taft, Secretary Knox, the Japanese ambassador, and Representative William Sulzer, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, in Washington, D. C., in the interest of American missionaries in Korea.

They were received in a very cordial manner by the President and the Japanese ambassador, and went over the case thoroughly in the conference with Mr. Knox. They said that their visit to Washington and their calls on officials were partly calls of courtesy, and were also to inform the President and the Secretary of State, as well as the Japanese ambassador, of the full facts of the case as they are known in America, and also to state that they had no complaint to make arising out of the reports from Korea.

The visitors asked that they be advised as to what they could do in the interest of the Korean missionaries who stand accused, and Secretary Knox replied that they had been pursuing the correct course, in his judgment, by manifesting their solicitude to the Japanese Government through the Japanese ambassador here. Mr. Knox assured them of the interest of the administration in all the Americans who have duties in Korea and other foreign lands, and that this government would not lose sight of the incident, and they might depend on the co-operation of the State Department if the occasion should arise where assistance could be given.

"We are not alarmed over the safety of Americans, and do not fear that the Koreans will not get full justice at the hands of the Japanese Government," declared Dr. Cooke. "One of the principal objects of our visit was to disclaim any intention of filing complaints against Japan with the United States Government, as has been reported. We appreciate the cordial treatment and liberal consideration given to American missionaries, both in Korea and Japan, and our one thought now is that they shall not be discredited through false reports."

Highly inflammatory despatches continue to appear in daily newspapers, but it would seem self-evident from their wording that they are printed with the idea of adding fuel to the smoldering fires of ill-feeling which some Americans seem to have for Japan. As far as can be learned, the conclusions which have been reached by the missionaries and missionary authorities whose statements we have quoted are those on which the greatest reliance may be placed.

About Going to Church

IN AN article in the Atlantic Monthly, Meredith Nicholson discusses the familiar topic of the prevalent religious indifference concerning church-going, and makes some interesting suggestions as to church efficiency. He asks: "Should Smith go to church?" Smith, who is a type of the average non-churchgoer, is not distinctly irreligious. Few people are absolutely and utterly without some sort of religion. But Smith is not interested in church services, even while he believes the church to be a good thing in the main, and sends his family there and his children to Sunday school. The point in the author's presentation is that we are over-churched as to the number of edifices and that they are locked up tightly all the week, save for a few hours on Sunday and on prayer-meeting nights.

His plea is unquestionably a valid one as far as it relates to a very large number of churches. He brings forward the familiar argument in favor of reducing the number of rival establishments by consolidation "founded upon local neighborhood needs." He would also introduce amusements, entertainments, concerts, dances and motion picture shows.

It is evident, however, that this writer is unable to furnish a satisfactory answer to his own question. The real reason why Smith and his kind do not go to church is because their sense of moral responsibility is unawakened and the fact that the church furnishes the great spiritual link of union between man and his Maker has not yet intelligently dawned upon their consciences. The church itself must go out to Smith and his kind, if they will not come to the church. There is something radically wrong with the system which keeps our churches open only eight or ten hours a week and closed during the rest of the time. From a mere worldly point of view, an investment so poorly conducted would be absurd. "Go ye out into the highways and byways and compel them to come in" clearly indicates the scope of the church's mission to the indifferent multitudes. The devil's chapels are always open. A church which is an active home missionary hive sends its influences out in all directions, and when Smith and his kind are brought under that influence by having the Gospel taken to them, the first important step is accomplished. They learn, probably for the first time in their lives, that the church is the appointed and most effective way of confessing Christ before men; and they learn also that it is a means of grace and blessing to all who use it.

It is easy to criticize the church. Such criticism generally comes from outsiders, who are not familiar with the real situation and its needs, and who regard it from a purely material point of view. It is difficult for them to comprehend why the usual worldly methods should not be applied to "boom" a church into popularity. They smile incredulously at the warning that such measures invariably involve a decline in spiritual power, for the church cannot serve both God and the world successfully. Such critics, however well-meaning, are not on the right plane for really helpful remedies. What is needed is the awakening of pastor and people, the kindling of the Gospel fires in the congregation, the personal consecration of each and every member to the work of extending the kingdom. When the true missionary spirit has once been aroused in a church, however small and insignificant its membership, it will grow apace, and when the Gospel invitation is extended indoors and out, and all the church's energies bend to the work of soul-saving, such a church cannot remain stagnant. It will go forward to larger activities and the noblest of spiritual triumphs.

The Danger of Twisting History

SOME people are easily misled by boastful language, the shallowness of which is soon made apparent by a little investigation. Father Phelan of St. Louis, a Catholic of prominence in the West and somewhat given to vainglorious exaltation of the greatness of the Roman Church, is a preacher of this stripe. He concluded a recent sermon on the greatness of Rome with these words: "The Catholics of the world are Catholics first and always; they are Americans, they are Germans, they are French, or they are English afterward." The California Christian Advocate of August 1 takes him sharply to task for these specific statements. It points out that France lately canceled the "Concordat," placed the parochial schools under government control and made the republic independent of the Vatican. The German Catholic premier, also quite recently, asked the Pope to rescind the Ne Temere Decree as far as his country was concerned, and it was done. In Spain and Portugal the Vatican has lately made prompt backdowns. How does Father Phelan's comprehensive claim square with these historical facts? It is by such boastful trumpetings—sound without sense—that the attention of the American people is being called to the extraordinary claims and ambitions of Rome, which, even on the most superficial investigation, are seen to be without reasonable basis. It is a risky thing to attempt to distort history, particularly recent history. The American people are beginning to awaken to the real character of such absurd pronouncements and to estimate them at their proper worth.

The Gospel's March in India

THE Christian population of India doubled in thirty years! Literally and absolutely doubled! Not almost, but really doubled—and more than doubled!

What a rapturous sound it would make if everybody who feels like saying hallelujah when those words are read should really say it! Can't you hear the great shout? It would be a good idea to say it anyway—even if you are alone. That is, if you are really glad. Are you? Glad that there are more than twice as many Christians in India as there were thirty years ago!

We'll get the figures out of the way so they won't bother the shout. For we shall have to shout a little over this, shan't we?—even if the shout is sent up by units instead of in a mass. In 1881 there were 1,862,634 Christians in India. Twice that number would be 3,725,268. But, true to Gospel measure, the count at the end of thirty years is 3,862,634, over one hundred thousand more than twice the enrolment thirty years ago.

Are you glad? Of course you are. Give your gladness voice, then. God will hear it. The spiritual currents of the world of prayer will record and carry it. Some shouts will arise from India itself. The shout of the American Christians will mingle with that of the Canadians and the Europeans—and will roll back to India, strengthening the faith of missionaries and converts there. The Church has long been praying for India; she must continue to pray; but shall we not pause a moment now for one great shout of praise? Some day the air waves recording the shout will meet. We shall hear the great, united echo of the word of praise we utter now from our delighted hearts. Let us say it aloud, by ones, by twos, by threes, perhaps, here and there, gathered in congregations, as we read this: HALLELUJAH!

Charged With the Spirit

SCIENTISTS tell us that there has been discovered in the forests of India a strange plant which possesses in a very high degree astonishing electric and magnetic power. The hand that breaks a leaf from it receives instantly a shock equal to that which is produced by the conducto of an inductive coil. At a distance of six meters a magnetic needle is affected by it. The energy o this singular force varies, but it is most powerfu when the sun is hottest, and in times of storms it intensity increases in striking proportion. On never by any chance sees a bird or an insect ligh on the electric plant; nature seems to warn them that they would find their death.

Let us seek—for it is the will of God concerning all his people—to be so instinct with the life, th divine force of the Holy Spirit, that whatever come in contact with us, into even casual association with us, will feel something of the heavenly influence that society about us will be affected, and every magnet of worldliness be disturbed, if not over come; so charged with the Spirit that, in the hot test fires of adversity, and in the most appalling storms of disaster and sorrow, that all-gracious power shall reach its supremest degree, while every light-winged messenger of Satan shall keep aloof finding not even a needle-point of our all-possessed hearts so unprotected as to invite his touch.

A Christian Scholar Gone

IN THE death of Bishop Henry White Warren not only the Methodist Church but the church a large in the United States sustains a distinct loss He was a religious leader of wide attainments, un usual energies and resources, eloquent on the plat form and with a love for natural science and mastery in that particular field which alone would have made him famous. His books on the Study o the Stars, Recreations in Astronomy and Among the Forces are notable contributions to scientific literature. Bishop Warren's scholarship never led him astray from the revelation of divine truth, but strengthened his spiritual powers and made the product of his voice and pen eminently valuable He was a consecrated scholar. For nearly thirty years he was a foremost factor in church activities and the thousands of addresses, sermons and lectures he delivered honored the ministry and dignified the pulpit. As a leader in Christian work, he has had few equals in his day and generation, and he will long be remembered.

General Notes

—ACCORDING TO A report by Frederick L. Hoffmann of the American Statistical Association, there were 15,000 suicides in the United States during 1911. While the rate in small cities is larger than in the big centers of population, the general average for all cities was 19.6 per 100,000. The principal causes assigned are disease, nervous troubles and alcoholism Mr. Hoffmann adds to these: social and moral discontent and the depressing and infectious influence of the publicity give to suicides in the newspapers.

—EARLY IN AUGUST the activities of a revolutionary force under General Mena in Nicaragua caused such apprehension on the part of the government that the United States Navy Department ordered the landing of marines for the preservation of order. The crew of the U. S. S. Tacoma was on the Pacific coast and three hundred and fifty men were landed from the collier Justin and taken to Managua. Military law had been proclaimed in the capital and though business was still being carried on, an outbreak hostile to the administration was expected at any moment.

—A DESPATCH from Athens, Greece, dated Wednesday, August 7 states that a massacre lasting seven hours followed a bomb explosion which occurred in the market place of Kotschana, fifty miles southwest of Uskup, European Turkey, on Friday, according to reliable information received here. Fifty Christians were killed and 200 seriously wounded by the Turks, who suspected them of having committed the bomb outrage, by which about fifty persons were killed or injured.

I have received three copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently, with all of which I am very highly pleased, more especially the Guardians of Liberty number. I wish to thank and congratulate you that you realize that you are not dependent on the minions of Rome. I also wish to commend you for publishing the article by Professor Dau on page 736 of issue July 24, also your editorial "Small but Significant" (p. 738). I hope that you will keep up this campaign of arousing the American Protestant people from their lethargy of fancied religious security to a real sense of their danger. L. C. MCELWEE.

Taking the Gospel to Boys

EVERY summer for several years past has seen the formation throughout the entire United States and Canada of Y. M. C. A. Boys' Camps. These camps, ranging in num- from twenty-five to a hundred and twenty-five , try each season under the leadership and tion of a few enthusiastic college men to de- among the boys a spirit of clean competition anly outdoor sports, a love of the open and an eciation of the lessons and the beauties of re. One of the most successful of these camps e one at Greenkill on First Bitterwater Lake e of four beautiful little lakes in the foothills he Catskill Mountains and about eight miles from Kingston, N. Y. This camp is under the rvision of the West Side Branch of the Young 's Christian Association, which is located in y-seventh Street, New York City. The boys under the closest but most kindly type of dis- ne, and are compelled by the agreement under h they go into camp to share the duties con- ed with its mainte- e. Each group of boys t keep its tent in ap- ie order. The sani- squad must see that camp grounds, in gen- , are kept clean. Then e are the garden ds, the water and d squads and the gen- assistants to the cook. Thursday and Friday ach week the boys are pelled to be out of p, so under the leader- of one of the regular ervisors or a senior they pack up their kets, pool their funds maintenance along the , and start off on a e." It is not at all un- al for them to cover n sixty to a hundred es in these three and r-day tramps. The ritual side of the boys' ures is carefully watch- over by the earnest ng men who are in rge. One of the most ular evening amuse- nts is the holding of a bonfire where the boys her about and sing. y usually start off h a few popular songs, n as it grows darker y work back to the old dbys that were as pop- r with their grand- ers as they are to-day. n some one starts an old-fashioned evangelistic n, and when that one is finished some one else a favorite to be sung, and so it works on till of the leaders has the opportunity of giving a le outdoor message of the Gospel to these boys manner which appeals to them much more than usual evangelistic address. These camps un- Christian environment are a great blessing in eloping the physical, mental, moral and spiritual ength of the young men, and inducting them re certainly into the class addressed by the stle:

have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, the word of God abideth in you. (I. John 2: 14.)

New Timber-Seasoning Method

A CHICAGO paper makes mention of a novel electrical method of treating timber which is d to have given striking results in France, and have changed the greenest wood into perfectly soned material. A watertight tank of suitable e is required. The timber is piled on a large d plate at the bottom until the tank is full, when econd lead plate is placed on top of the pile and nected to the negative pole of a dynamo, the tom connected to the positive pole. The space und the timber is then filled with a solution con- ning 5 per cent. of resin, 10 per cent. of borax d a trace of carbonate of soda. On turning on current, it passes from plate to plate through wood, driving out the sap, and the resin and ax take its place in the cells and interstices. is process being completed the timber is taken out and dried, when it is ready for use. It used to be that green timber had to be cut and left for one or more seasons to dry before it was fit for the carpenter's use. Of late years mechanical processes have been devised for the seasoning and more ready use of lumber. The new curing process in France promises to be successful. Christ refers to the different qualities of green and dry timber in his reference to coming judgments.

For if they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry? (Luke 23: 31.)

Took Too Great Risk

FRANK BRUNKHARDT, of Clifton, N. J., was standing on the Livingston Avenue bridge over the Hudson at Albany when the wind blew a five-dollar bill he held in his fingers into the water below. Instantly he jumped from the bridge into the water to regain it, and he was drowned in the attempt. He did not expect to be drowned, but intended to get the money, which to him as a workingman meant a good deal; but he took too great a risk and lost his life. A little boy in New York City the other day, living in an upper story of a flat-house, heard an organgrinder in the street in front and ran to the window and climbed up into it. He lost his balance and fell to the pavement below, from which his lifeless body was lifted. What are the poor little children to do for air or music, but run to the windows? But parents run entirely too great risk, and the harvest of death from the windows, fire escapes, and roofs is terrible. And when the boys and girls go out on the street to play (and where else can many of them go?) they are cut down by the trolley cars, the automobiles, the wagons, and other accidents. Parents and guardians often get very careless and take fearful risks for their children. There are in every community men who are diving in the river for the $5 bill and are being drowned physically and morally in the attempt to secure it. There are children and young people who are drawn by the melodies and enticements of vice, often by the strains of music in the service of wickedness, to the window of danger and the pavement of death below. Amid the moral perils of all kinds there is need of watchfulness and prayer.

Lest Satan should get an advantage of us, for we are not ignorant of his devices. (II. Cor. 2: 11.)

One Murder a Day

FOR the thirty-one days of July there was a murder a day in New York City and August is at this writing keeping up the record. This is twice the number for a corresponding period of last year. In ten instances there was no arrest made whatever, and there is not likely to be. Pretty nearly all of them were shot or stabbed to death under the eyes of witnesses, and yet with a police force of ten thousand, ten murderers out of thirty-one in one month got away. In three other instances the criminals were arrested and discharged. It is claimed that there are but eighteen murders in a whole year in London, while the homicides at the present rate in New York City alone would amount to 360 a year, or twenty times as many as in the largest city of the world. Savage, man-eating nations cannot do much worse than that. The record is an outrageous one. There is no denying the fact that there is a riot of crime of every kind in New York. The saloons, the gambling dens, the disorderly houses, the institutions of vice of every kind are allowed to break the law and do so by payment of fees to the grafter; and the gangs of gunmen have increased, and the blood running down the streets is the natural consequence. The responsibility for the carnival of murder must be fastened, and the heaviest penalty should fall not only on the base hand that does the deed, but the baser heart of greed and malice and treachery to solemn trust. It is true in New York City as it was in Palestine in the days of old:

They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind. (Hos. 8: 7.)

Wire-Bound Aorta

ONE of the most unusual operations for the swelling of an artery ever known was performed upon Oscar Nielson, a cabinet-maker, at the Bellevue Hospital in New York City the other day. There were present besides the medical staff of the hospital about fifty of the leading surgeons of the city. The operation was from the back. An incision was made after the back had been sprayed with cocaine. The fifth and sixth ribs were cut away and the distended aorta was reached. A little incision in the artery was made and the end of a gold wire thinner than a human hair was inserted and wound around the artery like a spring, until thirty-six feet of the wire had been used. An electrical current melted and fused the ends of the wire as well as hardened the artery. The blood started to circulate freely through the aorta, which was being strengthened by the wire and electricity, reducing the swelling and allowing the heart to perform its function. It is claimed that this is the second operation of this kind ever performed in this country. It is not expected that the binding of the artery with the gold wire will restore Mr. Nielson to full health, but it is claimed that his life will be prolonged. As the heart and the channels through which the currents flow to and from it are the fountain of life it is well to look after any disease that would hinder or destroy their action. As the affections or heart are the fountains of spiritual life, it is well to care for its condition and its health.

Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life. (Prov. 4: 23.)

A Historic Flag

THE other day Mrs. Eliza C. Hayward, who rode on the first steam passenger train in the United States and made a flag used by General Grant during the Civil War, died at the home of her daughter in Chicago. The train ran over a road between Albany and Schenectady, N. Y. The flag made by Mrs. Hayward is one of the mementoes preserved in Grant's tomb. Mrs. Hayward was ninety-one years of age. The flag the woman made as a symbol of patriotism is a reminder of the emblem of essential truth and righteousness used by the army of God:

Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth. (Ps. 60: 4.)

A MONT-LAWN BOY'S STORY

JAKE SWEENEY came to Mont-Lawn last year toward the end of the season, and a livelier boy than Jake never came out of the New York slums. Whistling, singing, playing, working from morning till night, Jake was everywhere at once. Games and walks, picnics, fishing, there was Jake leading off every time. At milking time and song service, Sunday school and preaching, Jake Sweeney was always there, and never once was caught among the laggards. He was first in the ranks to meals at Fort Plenty, first in the dormitory procession to bed, first up in the morning, fresh, clean and high-spirited, whistling, singing, playing, working again through each happy day.

But before his visit was over he fell ill, and after a few days spent in the sweet, fresh hospital room in the Homestead at Mont-Lawn, where the attendant doctor watched carefully over him and administered best of treatment, his mother, who had little faith in Jake's being ill, took him home. He grew very ill indeed, however, and the nice doctor at Mont-Lawn cared for him through the whole long winter after he came back to town. This season Jake was invited to spend two weeks again at Mont-Lawn, and the first night, as he was saying his prayers, the attendant passing by his little white bed where he knelt heard him say: "And, dear God, so long as I am back at Mont-Lawn, can't we be on the same old terms?"

On those days upon which children are taken to Mont-Lawn, the reception rooms in the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, set apart specially for the Home work, are crowded with poor, hard-working mothers who are filled with gratitude for the opportunity given to their children to visit the country. "Our little ones must live, and we do want them to be well and happy," these mothers say over and over again, and though the little helpers are sorely missed from homes where they are of so much use, the mothers gladly give them up and cheerfully assume the extra work themselves.

Mother nature is the same everywhere. By the normal instinct, these mothers in the poorer districts know what it means to their children to have a taste of clean, pure living, and long draughts of health-giving milk, and country fare, with sunshine and hills and ideals, and they gladly look to us for a little portion of these things which they cannot supply, but which they would willingly give to our children, if the tables were turned and our little ones were suffering. Mothers are more grateful for Mont-Lawn than any other class of people.

Will you not undertake now, before the season closes, to send a child to Mont-Lawn—the Children's Paradise—to be looked upon as your own guest there? She or he will write and thank you for your goodness, and your reward in gratitude will be priceless. If you could only see them dancing, singing, swinging, playing, shouting for very gladness, as children will, how your heart w warm to them!

Mont-Lawn has never in a single instance fa of making its visitors happy. The good wor carried on under the auspices of THE CHRIST HERALD, friends of the institution, and friend the little children of the poor. Every donatio matters not how small, is a direct gift to little c dren. No effort is spared to take as many li visitors as the Home will accommodate. The c dren come and go in relays of from fifty to a h dred. Who can reckon the good that stows it away in the hearts and minds of each hungry li band, and which, by the mysterious ways of li children, is brought back to the homes in the te ments?

OUR CHILDREN AND THE BIBLE

WHAT IS TO BE DONE TO TRAIN AMERICAN YOUTH IN GOD'S WORD?

BY REV. WALTER KOENIG

Paterson, N. J.

I WAS interested in reading the description of the Presbyterian Church school in Atlanta, Ga., by President White in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 17, as no doubt many others were, for there seems to exist a growing concern about the proper, all-around education of children—education in distinction from instruction. Of late years, voices have been heard in increasing volume from serious-minded pedagogues, clergymen, parents, and earnest Christians, showing that many are troubled as they think of the twenty to twenty-five million children of our country and recall that the majority are receiving, day by day, instruction totally divorced from the Word of God. The statement that education—meaning instruction in the various branches of learning—is the mother of civil righteousness is to-day sincerely challenged. The moral stamina must be strengthened. Dry "moral" discourses will not avail. We don't tell a starving man to grow strong and see to it that the pantry is locked.

Morality as a pedagogical subject cannot safely be separated from Christianity, much less substituted for it. It runs in the same direction; but it can not and surely does not surpass or displace Christianity. Christianity is the larger sphere and includes morality; the righteousness which Jesus taught embraces but transcends morality. Moreover, a Christian is persuaded that the true source of morality in the individual is the knowledge and acceptance of God in Christ (John 15: 4, 5). This morality and righteousness we have in the Bible. So let us get the Bible into the boy, as the man of Atlanta said of his own boy when he helped to bring into existence the Presbyterian Day School.

I have spoken in a previous communication of Lutheran Day Schools, as I know them a little better than other schools. In my city, the Lutheran Church established one forty-five years ago, which to-day still is in a flourishing condition. The congregation is now planning a new modern building. Books are not furnished free. Tuition is one dollar a month, and is reduced in the case of the second child from the same family. Of course, this tuition fee does not cover the expenses. The congregation pays the rest out of its own treasury. It has been remarked of a wealthy Boston church that it was paying annually $2,000 for its music but nothing for its children. This congregation is doing the reverse. In a number of cities, tuition is entirely free. And the basis of that is the view that all members of the church, even if they have no children of their own, on a broad view of the subject, have an equal interest in the safe upbringing of the youth of their congregation or town.

These Lutheran Church schools add the study of the Bible, and usually also the study of German, to the common branches. Yet with regard to the latter, the results are gratifying. A very recent experience is interesting. A certain list of words used in the Chicago public schools was dictated to children of the seventh and eighth grades of a Lutheran school (Holy Cross) in St. Louis. The average for the eighth grade was 91 per cent.; for the seventh grade 79 per cent. In three grammar schools of the city of Chicago, the averages were respectively 50 per cent., 68 per cent. and 72 per cent. Yet neither this school nor that of the Presbyterians of Atlanta has any intention of antagonizing the public school system. There must be public schools for many who would otherwise go without instruction altogether. But it is their answer to the query, "What is to be done?" What is to be done to get the Bible into the child? It isn't there now, as a general thing.

The ignorance of the Bible among the young men of America is again brought home to us by a report of James McConaughy, teacher of the English Bible at Mount Hermon School, as published in the Sunday School Times. Two sets of questions, from which the following are selected, were asked of one hundred and seven new students:

1. (a) Write in full the names of any five Old Testament books. (b) Tell for each the leading actor or chief subject of the book.
2. Write the first and fifth commandments.
3. (a) Who were saved from the judgment of the Flood, and why? (b) Who tried to save Sodom and Gomorrah from destruction and how? (c) Who lost his life on Mount Gilboa, and why?
4. Who was each of the following, and what did each have to do with God's chosen people: Jacob, Aaron, Gideon, Samuel, and Elijah?
5. What great event in the history of God's people happened at the Red Sea? At Mount Sinai? At Jericho?
6. Who built the tabernacle? Where? Who built the temple? Where? What was the difference between them? How were both used?

It will be noticed that these questions deal only with general facts and do not expect details. None of the 107 prospective students were under sixteen years of age, and they averaged about nineteen. They were above the average young man in chara ter and presumably in knowledge of the Bib They were selected from a much larger number applicants, because they had formed an earne purpose in life. Eighty-four had attended Sund school an average of six years each.

Without entering upon the wording of the a swers—some of which were: "Adam and Eve we saved from the Flood because they believed God;" "Jesus made the Jews leave Babylon;" "S mon Peter told the Jews where Jesus was hiding "Saul saw a bush burning"—the following résun is worth some thought. Six, after reading th questions, made no attempt to answer an Twenty-three others did not answer correctly o question out of fifteen. Fifty-five were able give, though not always to spell correctly, th names of five Old Testament books. Here are tw specimens: "Luke, John, Isicak, Peater, Paul; "Genesious, I. Timothy, II. Timothy, Amose, Ruth When it came to the commandments, only twenty six were able to give the first and fourteen the fift Thirty knew that the law was given at Mour Sinai. Only five knew of the division of the king dom after Solomon's death.

What is to be done? The Presbyterians of A lanta have answered: "Church schools." Som Episcopalians and some Reformed have given th same answers. Many Lutherans for decades hav said: "Church schools under present conditions. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would perform a signa service, it seems to me, if it should invite fro clergymen, Sunday-school superintendents, class leaders and educators an expression of opinio Those answers would be most helpful which show together with a plan, the way to accomplish it un der existing conditions. An impartial symposiu and résumé would, I am persuaded, be read wit interest by thousands.

[As the importance of Bible education for th young, now so sadly neglected, is a subject whic urgently appeals to Christian people of every de nomination, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invites a fre and general expression of opinion from pastors superintendents, class-leaders, and all who have th spiritual welfare of the rising generation at heart Practical suggestions will be welcomed for publi cation, and especially from those who have made o are now making personal efforts in the direction in dicated. All letters on the subject should be ad dressed: "BIBLE EDUCATION, THE CHRISTIAN HER ALD, Bible House, New York."]

A BABY OF THE FRONTIER

COMPTON, standing there alone with his wife at his feet in a dead faint and Molly bending over her, had seen it all. He knew that if he gave the signal those gallant men would try to ride through the whole Cheyenne Nation, but it would be throwing away their lives, and he decided instantly against it.

But before the men out in the meadow could obey the recall—indeed, they had become so scattered in their wild ride that it took some little time to get them into orderly ranks again—there was a sudden burst of rifle firing far to the left, behind an unusually steep hill near which the river ran and around which the trail entered the valley. Dexter was a good soldier; he knew the situation as well as Kennard; everybody knew it as a matter of fact.

"That'll be Calmore and hard pressed," he said to the other captains. "We must relieve him."

"Certainly," was the quick answer as they noticed the Indians to the front galloping toward the pass.

"I'll disregard the recall," said Dexter.

He rode out a little in advance of the three troops, and waved his sword to the figure he could see standing on the tower. Compton had heard the firing; he had seen the smoke; he had a better view than the troopers in the field. He waved his hand at Dexter and the next moment ordered a bugle to be sounded, which gave him the needed permission.

"Forward!" cried the veteran captain exultantly.

The battalion moved off at a gallop up the meadow toward the pass behind the hill. They got there just in time. Calmore, with a dozen wagons containing wounded settlers and their women and children, was fighting desperately with the Sioux and Cheyennes circling around him furiously, pouring in a withering fire. Dexter did not wait a second; he fell like a storm on the flanks of the Indians, fighting them back. Indeed, that was easy, for they invariably gave way before an impetuous, dashing charge. Dexter kept his men well in hand, and it was not long before the pass was cleared. Calmore, who did not need any instructions, urged his wagons in Dexter's rear and then ordered his tired men up on Dexter's right. The whole body fell back skirmishing, hard pressed by the Indians, who, although they outnumbered the soldiers five to one, did not venture to come to hand-to-hand death-grips with them.

Dexter handled his battalion with masterly skill and they presently reached the fort, one or two having been killed and a few more wounded. Compton and the few men left with the women and children met them at the gate.

"You didn't bring back my baby?" cried the desperate mother, as the excited soldiers filed through and formed line on the little parade.

"Mrs. Compton," said Dexter, throwing himself from his horse, "I wish to God I had been in her place, ma'am."

"And you too failed, Mr. Hadden?"

"Madam," said the young lieutenant, "I would cheerfully have given my life for hers. I rode the best I knew how, but they had too great a start over us."

"Did they kill her?" asked Compton.

"I don't believe so," answered Calmore. "I saw her alive in the arms of a chief just before Dexter saved us."

"Were you all saved, Calmore?"

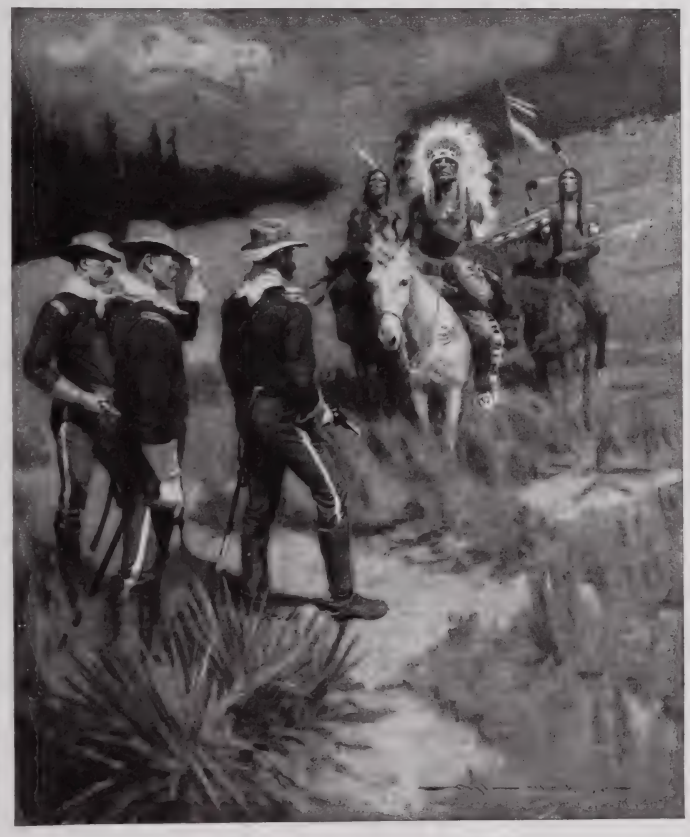
"Three men were killed, sir, and seven wounded," answered Calmore; "but we brought off a score or more of women and children, besides some wounded settlers. That's Dull Knife out there with all the Cheyennes. If it hadn't been for our dash for the settlement every woman and baby we've got in the wagon would have been gone. The whole Sioux Nation is out, too. I am awfully sorry to hear about the baby, Mrs. Compton," continued Calmore.

"Now that you are all safe I want to know how she got out," asked Compton sternly. It was the first opportunity he had had to investigate the affair. "Sergeant of the guard!"

"Yes, sir," said Schmidt.

"Do you know anything about this?"

Then a white-faced man of the fort stepped from the ranks of the guard and saluted.



Compton . . . stepped forward a few paces and said, "What do you want?"

"It is my fault, sor."

"Meagher!" cried Compton.

"If the colonel pleases, I was on guard an' the little gate was opened as it always is, an' my attention was disthracted elsewhere an' the child got out an' we didn't know it until Leftenant Hadden burst through the gate, sor."

"What distracted you?" thundered Compton.

" 'Twas me, sor," said Molly McNeil, bravely assuming her part of the responsibility. " 'Twas me that tempted the bhoy. Oh, the evil day that I was born, sor!"

The colonel's eyes flashed.

"Officer of the guard, put that man in the guardhouse," he cried. "Desertion of his post of duty in time of war is the charge. By heavens, it is punishable with death. Mr. Severance!"

"Here, sir," answered the adjutant.

"Make out a detail for a court to convene in the morning to try Private Meagher for deserting his post."

"Oh, for the love of heaven!" wailed Molly. " 'Tis my fault, 'tis mine intirely."

She threw herself at the colonel's feet.

"Out of my way!" said Compton, turning aside.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I want you all at my quarters. Come, Mary." He took his wife by the hand, he put his arm around her before them all and half led and half carried her across the parade.

A low growl like thunder rose from the men; then finally one of them a little bolder than the rest voiced the demand.

"Colonel Compton, give us leave, sir, and we'll go out and clean up the whole Cheyenne tribe to git back the girl."

"For the honor of the regiment," added old Schmidt, "just give us a chance."

"Ay," cried the first sergeant of "B" Troop, "give us leave to wipe out the disgrace that has been brought upon us all by that coward yonder. It is a shame he is to the Irish and to the regiment and to the army."

There was an instant surge toward poor Danny, who stood disarmed and helpless in the grasp of the troopers who had arrested him.

"You're right, me bhoys," he cried. "I deserve it all. Kill me, I'll welcome the bullet."

But Dexter, Calmore, Hadden and the rest of the officers threw themselves to the front.

"Get back in ranks there!" roared Dexter furiously, his soldierly instincts outraged by their mob-like movements. "What do you mean?"

"Ask the colonel to let us go at 'em, sir," the sergeant-major rather demanded than requested.

"You hear, Colonel Compton," cried Dexter.

For a moment the colonel hesitated.

"John," cried his wife imploringly, "let them go; they may save her."

"No," said Compton decisively, "it is not in the power of men. There are too many Cheyennes out there. I am responsible for these men, for these women and children in this post. I can't throw the lives of these men away uselessly. Remember, there are other mothers here. I appreciate your spirit, men; I'd like nothing better than to lead you on such a charge; but it can't be. Captain Dexter!"

"Yes, sir."

"Dismiss the battalion, detail one troop for guard, and then meet me in my quarters at once with all the officers who can be spared; we must determine our course of action."

CHAPTER III

DULL KNIFE OFFERS AN EXCHANGE

THE informal council of war at the colonel's headquarters decided, in view of the overwhelming numbers of the Indians on the hills, that nothing on earth could be done to rescue the baby. There was not a single officer nor trooper who would not gladly have periled his own life for the child, but the officers were placed in positions of public trust, the post was crowded with refugees, its maintenance was necessary for the safety of the trail and the keeping open of the supply route to the front. Fort Sullivan was the only place of refuge, and the only protection as well, of a vast extent of country.

The colonel and his officers realized that he had no right to jeopardize these great issues for the life of one little baby, however precious she might be to him. One or two of the junior officers did indeed advocate a bold dash at the Indian encampment, but the votes of the older and more experienced captains were unanimously against it. And by these votes they showed their high qualities; for Mrs. Compton, a piteous picture of silent appeal, sat in a corner of the room listening to this discussion which would determine the fate of her child. There were elements of heroism in her composition as well, for she gave vent to no outcry, she broke into no wild and passionate entreaties. She sat still and rigid as the mountain range, her white face stony with horror and grief, listening to the verdict of these gallant men.

When all had spoken, Compton, with one pitying glance at his wife, confirmed the view of the majority.

"Gentlemen, you have decided rightly," he said. "To attempt with our force to ride through those Indians would be madness. There are women and other children here, God bless them, and our first duty is to them. The post must be defended at all hazards; we can't spare a man."

"Let me go alone, sir," pleaded Hadden. "I can't stand it to see your wife—"

The lieutenant choked up and could not finish. The colonel shook his head.

"You are too good an officer to be thrown away, Hadden, and you don't know this Indian game. If Marnett were here now—where is Marnett, Captain Calmore?"

"Why," exclaimed Calmore in great surprise, "didn't he come in with us?"

"I didn't see him," answered Compton. "Did any of you, gentlemen?"

"I was the last man in the gate," said Dexter. "I saw every one in ahead of me, and I am certain that Marnett was not there."

Calmore struck his hand on the table. "I wouldn't have had anything happen to him for the world," he exclaimed. "We had a running fight for two days, and I don't hesitate to say that if it hadn't been for his skill and resourcefulness we should have been wiped out."

"How on earth was he left behind? That old trapper had served me and mine in days gone by," returned the colonel feelingly, "and I value and esteem him more than any of you can. Don't take any blame to yourself, Captain Calmore. In a running fight like that it would have been impossible to watch every man. Besides, I have confidence that if he did not come in it was because he wanted to stay out. Gentlemen, his absence gives me a ray of hope."

"Oh," cried Mrs. Compton, "do you think—"

"I don't think anything, my dear; I only hope, a little."

"Mrs. Compton," said Captain Dexter, "with the colonel's permission, you surely know how we feel. There isn't a one of us who wouldn't do anything to get the baby back."

"I know," faltered Mrs. Compton, "that you are as brave and devoted a set of officers and men as any on earth. I know as well as you that nothing can be done for my baby now. Her fate is in the hands of God."

"Yes," returned Calmore, a veteran of many a hard campaign and desperate fight, "I know these Indians well. There is more than a chance, I think, that they won't do her any harm; being a baby they may adopt her into their tribe."

"My judgment agrees with that of Captain Calmore," said Dexter; "I don't consider the case as absolutely desperate."

"I pray not," returned the woman. "But whether it be or not, we can do nothing."

"Certainly nothing now," said Emmett, another troop commander, "but by heaven, if we can get the regiment together we'll ride through the whole Cheyenne Nation, sword in hand, and rescue her, or—"

"Gentlemen," said Compton, "I have been proud of my command; never more proud than at this moment of bereavement. Now we must counsel together about the defense of the post. It may be that they won't attack us. They have shown extraordinary boldness in approaching so far, and I fear it may have gone hard with the troops at the front, else how could they be here in such force, so many miles in their rear?"

At that moment the door from the porch was thrown open, and an orderly from the guard appeared in the entrance.

"The officer of the guard directs me to report to the commanding officer," he said saluting, "that a flag of truce from the Indians is outside in the meadow."

It was one of the conditions of this savage warfare that the white men were bound to respect the conventions and habits of civilization. A flag of truce must be received, although the Indians themselves would not have paid the least attention to a similar advance on the part of the soldiers.

"Come, gentlemen all," said Compton, rising and buckling his sword around him; "we have no secrets, and we'll see what they want."

Followed by the other officers the colonel repaired to the main gate. Old Sergeant Schmidt reported that three Indians had ridden up, one of them carrying a dirty white rag on the end of a lance, and they had been halted by command some thirty yards from the gate. By the colonel's direction the wicket at the side of the main gate was opened, and Compton, attended by Dexter and Hadden, stepped out, the other officers mounting to the tower by the officer of the guard. The three Indians sat their horses impassive as statues. Compton, revolver in hand, stepped forward a few paces and said,

"What do you want?"

"Me got letter," said the leading Indian, a magnificent specimen of Cheyenne manhood with a gorgeous war bonnet on his head.

"Give it here," said the colonel.

"You no fire?"

"No."

It was a tribute to the honor of the white man that the Indian recognized that no further assurance was necessary. He kicked his pony in the ribs and spoke a word. The animal slowly trotted over to the three dismounted officers. Dexter and Hadden kept him well covered with their revolvers. The Indian rode up with utmost unconcern and halted within reaching distance of Compton. He handed him a dirty, greasy scrap of paper. It read this way:

"We got big white chief's papoose, we give back, you give fort. You no give fort, we kill baby."

The writing—that of some half-breed—was as ignorant as the paper was dirty, but the purport of the message was unequivocal and not to be misunderstood. The Indians offered to exchange the baby for the post. The proposition would not be entertained for a moment, of course, and the colonel did not even hesitate.

"No," answered Compton promptly.

"You no give?" queried the Indian.

Compton shook his head.

"Look," said the chief, turning in his saddle and pointing back to the hill on which the warriors were clustered. As he spoke, as if in obedience to the gesture he made, a gigantic Indian separated himself from the balance and raced down the slope. He stopped just out of rifle shot and held the baby up in his hand, while with the other he brandished a knife whose bright blade reflected the afternoon sunlight.

"I will not give up the fort to anybody," said Compton sternly; "but I want to tell you that if you hurt one hair of that baby's head, as there is a God above me I will make the Cheyenne tribe pay with a life for every drop of blood that's shed."

How much of this the chief understood could not be known, for it was Dexter who asked:

"Is he proposing that we give up the post for the child?"

"Yes," answered Compton.

The chief grunted, pointing from the child to the stockade as if for the illumination of Dexter.

"And I have told him that we can not entertain the proposition."

"Good!" said Dexter grimly.

"Hadden could no longer control himself. He stepped closer to the chief and shoved his revolver at the man's head.

"You murderous dog," he said, "I don't know what stops me from pulling the trigger."

"Respect the flag, Mr. Hadden," cried Compton. "Get back," he flung out his arm toward the chief, "and give them my message. We won't give up the fort, and if you hurt the child you'll pay."

"White chief heap fool," said the Indian, turning his back on the group and trotting away to his comrades.

"For God's sake, let me plug him, colonel," cried Hadden, nervously fingering his revolver.

"It can't be," said the colonel. "Come, gentlemen."

In a few moments they were at the fort again. A few words put the officers in possession of the proposition which the colonel had so unhesitatingly rejected. Some of the men heard it, too, and at once communicated it to the others. The little fort was a seething mass of passion. Dispositions to repel the expected attack and to hold the position were quickly made. The number of the Indians seemed to be increasing. It was the heaviest war party that the Cheyennes had ever sent afield. Experienced men estimated that there were at least a thousand warriors there. They were evidently making camp, for they made no move to attack the post; on the contrary, as night approached, fires were kindled here and there on the hills and other preparations made for the passing of night.

Whether they would eventually attack the post or not, no one could say; but Compton did not expect any trouble during the night, although the guards were warned not to relax their vigilance and watchfulness on that account.

After seeing everything in readiness, the colonel summoned Dexter and Calmore, the two officers upon whom he placed most reliance, to his quarters once more. It had been impossible to keep secret the Indian offer of exchange, and Mrs. Compton was aware of it. She would not have been a mother if her heart had not yearned toward acceptance; but, like her husband, she knew that was impossible. She was a soldier's wife, and she schooled herself to take up again the ordinary duties of life, which, though they sometimes are frightfully hard, yet after all sometimes save the breaking mind.

Supper was on the table when the colonel and the two officers entered the room, and Mrs. Compton bade them partake of what she had provided.

"I have had to do it myself," she apologized. "Molly is in a state of utter collapse, poor girl, not only over the baby," she bit her lips and fought down the choking sensation in her throat, "but because it was her foolish flirting with Meagher that caused him to neglect his duty and made them both forget the baby, who evidently slipped through the wicket gate unnoticed. It was ajar at the time, so far as I can learn."

"Meagher deserves all that is coming to him," said Dexter, a grim old bachelor who had little sympathy for woman's wiles.

"Yes, but I am sorry for him," returned Calmore. "He was one of the best troopers in the regiment."

"Molly says it is her fault."

"But Meagher will have to take the punishment just the same," returned Compton, dereliction of duty being the one thing he could not pardon.

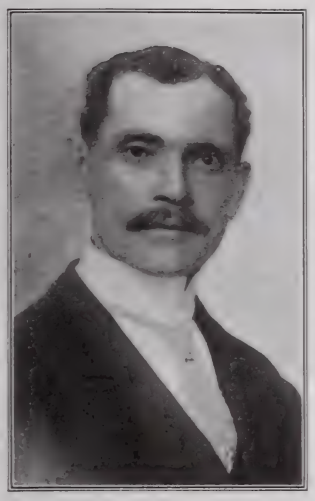
"Molly says they will shoot him, but Then my heart warmed to the work and when once I had decided to fully cast my lot with my people—to suffer with them as they suffer or rise with them as they rise—my doubts disappeared and I saw nothing ahead but success."



Rev. Felix A. Curtright

In this unique work in Joliet the church and social center are not divorced but go hand in hand. The building is open at all times. The only difference to be noticed is that there are more people about on Sundays than on week days. There is a Sunday school that packs the church; the Bible class alone numbers sixty-five. During the week there are sociables and lectures upon practical subjects. An employment bureau is maintained, and in October a night school will be opened. A restaurant, a reading room and shower and tub baths are part of the equipment. The whole aim of the work is to help men and women become better citizens. Mr. Curtright believes that the time is not far off when any religious organization to succeed must open its doors every day in the week and minister to the bodies as well as the souls of its people.

Chalmers

It Moves the Farm to Town

The Chalmers "Thirty-six" gets you into town in about the time it used to take to hitch up the team. Hills make no difference, and heavy roads mean only shifting the gear from high to third speed.

You have thirty-six real horse-power under your hand, with the wheels, axles, and frame to carry it.

The Chalmers never has distemper, pip, or heaves. It is always in condition, and is fresh at the end of the run.

The two great points about the "Thirty-six" are reliability and real economy. Economy depends on what you get out of a car as much as what you put into it.

When you buy a Chalmers "Thirty-six" you are through buying cars; you've got something that will stand up under you for a good many years and will cost you less, per year of service, than any other car.

Think of these splendid features in a medium priced car: Electric lights, self-starter, Turkish cushions, nickel trimmings, speedometer, long stroke motor, demountable rims, 4 forward speed transmission, dual ignition system, carburetor dash adjustment.

Let us send you our book, "Life Story of the Chalmers Car." This will answer all the "Whys" you have in mind, as they cannot be answered in this short advertisement.

THE HERODS OF HISTORY*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

JOHN and Herod, prophet and king, preacher and president, are all "ministers of God." That title Paul twice applies to rulers (Rom. 13). This lesson shows a faithful minister set in contrast with one who was fearful, and so a failure.

The Herod family has become the synonym of cruelty and tyranny. The first Herod, though he had built Herod's Temple, attempted to kill Christ, and in the effort massacred all the babies of Bethlehem. He treated his own children so badly that the Emperor Augustus said, "I would rather be his swine than his son." In the intoxication of anger, to which he was subject, he murdered, at different times, his brother, his grandfather, three of his sons, his wife's mother and his wife, Mariamne, who was the favorite among his ten wives. And when he was dying, he ordered that the chief men of Judea should be killed lest there should be no mourning but rather rejoicing when he was dead.

His son, Herod Antipas, the Herod of this lesson, called by Christ "that fox"—a fine characterization of the unprincipled politician in all ages—was less given to murder than his father. He took the legal wife of his brother, Herod Philip, as his own, no doubt veiling his crime under some unwarranted decree of divorce.

The fearless preacher, John the Baptist, God's ambassador at his royal court, arraigned the king and queen for this mutual crime before the supreme court of the universe. Herod bore the rebuke, even if he did not obey it, but women when they are wicked seem to go into sin more intensely than men, and so the Jezebel at his side insisted that John should be sent to the dungeon of Machærus. Edersheim describes two dungeons in its ruins: "One of them deep down, its sides scarcely broken in, with small holes still visible in the masonry, where staples of wood and iron had once been fixed. As we look down into this hot darkness we shudder in realizing that this terrible keep had for nigh ten months been the prison of that son of the free wilderness, the brave herald of the coming kingdom, the humble, earnest, self-denying John the Baptist."

An incident is worth repeating here, of the European prison to which many martyrs to liberty and religion had been committed, where the writer saw, scratched deeply with a nail in the stone wall: "Be thou faithful unto the deathe, and I will give thee a crowne of life." In our times we need to ponder such heroism, for many of us are not faithful even up to the sneering point. So far from being faithful when it costs blood, we are not willing to face even rain.

Heroism in War and Peace

How shall we make Christians as brave in the daily tests of faithfulness as soldiers usually are in battle, as firemen commonly are, as life-savers are, as even scientists are in their frequent risks of life for the promotion of knowledge?

Often we read in the papers that even naturally timid women have stopped runaway horses, driven burglars from their homes, rescued drowning men. Such courage is found among Christians in the supreme tests of martyrdom, as recently in China. But the problem we are considering is how to develop such courage in "the piping times of peace" in the common tasks of the common day; the courage to speak unwelcome truth in public and in private—the last the harder of the two—the courage to adhere to convictions among those who sneer at them; to do among the Romans as the Romans ought to do.

For one thing preachers and teachers, by their very illustrations, should prove that they really believe that "peace hath her victories, not less renowned than war," for there can be no doubt that the expected reward of public approval stimulates the soldier and the fire-fighter to daring deeds. We should make the heroes of peace feel that their reward will be not only a "crown" in eternity, but also the grateful appreciation of good men here on earth. This earthly approval, however, should never be counted on by God's heroes, who are often blamed even by the good, whom they outstrip in daring. We need to get in the habit of living as in God's sight, supremely regardful of his approval. "How can we fear anything with him looking at us?"

Herod had a living conscience, and he often called forth the imprisoned prophet and "heard him gladly." But for fear of his wife he would have set him free. He had no thought of punishing him by anything worse than imprisonment.

The King of the King

Here comes in the story of King Alcohol, the power behind the throne then and now, that outherods Herod in cruelty and tyranny and lust. Every crime of all the Herods is repeated by Alcohol on a grander scale. Herod put in his mouth what steals away the brains of king and peasant alike. In his after-dinner drunkenness, with his guests in like case, Herod called for the dessert that usually follows the wine in the Orient, as it is coming to do in our cities to-day—the dancing girl. He utters his foolish promise to reward the dancer, Salome, with "whatever she would ask, to the half of his kingdom."

A queen's daughter, in order to secure such a promise and through it revenge for a wicked mother against her faithful chaplain, had taken the dancing part usually left to the lowest women. Salome's queen-mother bade her ask the head of John the Baptist. The awful request sobered Herod. But he was not brave enough to say he had made a mistake and face the sneers of his wife and guests. He might at least have pleaded that a bad promise is worse kept than broken, though better not spoken. In the words of Shakespeare:

> It is a great sin to swear unto a sin,
> But greater sin to keep a sinful oath.
> Who can be bound by any solemn vow
> To do a murderous deed?

But this was one of many cases where a king was himself a woman's slave. And so in his lonely dungeon John was straightway beheaded, and the woman whose sin he had rebuked received the ghastly head on a platter for her feast of revenge.

Historic parallel is seen in the case of Fulvia, to whom the head of Cicero was brought, who pierced his tongue, which in life had often pierced her guilty conscience.

Herodias, the destroyer of John, was at last the destroyer of her husband in everything but life. In her ambition, she induced him to go to Rome to secure the title of king. Instead, he was there charged with crimes, and was deposed by Caligula and banished to Lyons.

This lesson invites us to survey the ruin drink has wrought in the specific realm of government, illustrating the warning in Proverbs 31: 4, 5;

> It is not for kings to drink wine,
> Lest they forget the law
> And pervert the justice due to any that is afflicted.

Railroads are insisting on total abstinence in their employees. Perhaps we shall learn some day that as clear a brain is required to run a government as to run a freight train.

King Ben-hadad was defeated when he was drinking himself drunk, he and the thirty and two kings that helped him (I. Kings 20: 16). Belshazzar, the young king of Babylon, only seventeen years old, was overthrown while he drank sacrilegiously from the sacred vessels taken from God's temple (Dan. 5: 1-30).

Never Shakes Your Confidence

DON'T let your long planned hunting trip be spoiled,—spoiled by your gun not rising to the occasion at some critical moment. And you know how your gun's shortcomings always show up at the critical moment. After that your confidence is gone.

The six Hunter Brothers have kept on the trail of shot gun shortcomings with invention, workmanship and Purpose, for 22 years.

Purpose got rid of "shooting loose" by producing a bolt, which double-wedges through extension rib and grips tight with a double rotary grip. Purpose created Smith "one-screw access," which eliminates lock neglect and troubles—makes oiling and cleaning simple. And so on through the list, making the Smith Gun the gun without a single shortcoming to mar the pleasure of your trip.

Ask your dealer to show you the new Smith 20 gauge—20 gauge from butt to muzzle. Write today for catalog, showing all grades from $25 to $1500.

LETTERS FROM OUR BOYS

MINOR JONES, Maryland.

"I must tell you of my success; it made me very happy. I received The Christian Herald at 4 p. m. yesterday, and after doing my studies I went out and sold every one in one and one-half hours. Last week it was raining all the week and it was hard, but mamma said the hardest fight is just before success. I could have sold fifteen copies more if I had them."

WALTER COUSINS, New York.

"I wish to let you know I received the watch in good condition. I feel very proud of it, as it is a beauty, and I prize it highly. Kindly accept my sincere thanks for it. In five hours I sold seventy-one copies of The Christian Herald. My success so far may encourage some other boys. The more I sell, the more I want to."

JOHN GEIGER, New York.

"I am in receipt of the pin. I think it is a very nice one, and I am very glad that I got it. I hope there will be a good many more boys who will get them."

"I've known how to swim for a whole year. And besides I had sent all my dolls up with mother the other day. So I didn't have anything but grandmother to look after. So I called out, 'Grandma! Then a man pulled me into a boat and said to help bail. But I told him I wouldn't unless he helped grandmother, too. They found her, but just then somebody sat down on my legs. I screamed, because it hurt dreadfully, but nobody seemed to know what was the matter with me. Then whoever it was moved and I was all right, and I helped bail out the boat."

Miss Dorothy Lockett

This is the little heroine's story of twenty-five minutes that might well have tried the courage of the bravest aboard. In the thick darkness none could tell who was saved or who was missing. No lives were lost, however, and though the City of Rockland had twenty-five feet sheared off her bow, her stanch bulkheads kept her afloat.

"Tan the Tiger" was fore- in the mêlée, and aimed his stone such effect that it cut the mis- ary's forehead, causing blood to He narrowly escaped with his Some years later the city was ed by Thomas Protheroe, and n Tan was ready to drive the "for- devil" out. As the preacher warmed to his subject the people listened with marked attention, not one of them attempting to make the least disturbance. The moment he stopped, "Tan the Tiger" pushed his way to the front and, in a voice that could be heard by all, exclaimed: "Foreign teacher, I am known as the Tiger. I am a drunkard, and have broken those ten commandments you have spoken about. Can your Jesus save such a sinner as I am?" The answer was: "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners. He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him." Tan the Tiger exclaimed: "Then he can save me." And straightway, in the open air, he was converted. Christ saved him, and the tiger gave place to the lamb.

The Success of the Slain

There is another profound lesson of encouragement in the story of John, which Dr. Maltbie D. Babcock embodied in a sermon to Endeavorers on the text: "Were slain with the sword" —words that appear in a list of the victories of faith (Heb. 11), reminding us of the victories of those who fail—the prisoners, the martyrs, who were vanquished and yet victors, like their crucified Master. At the last it is not Herodias, but John, that comes off victor.

"Standard" GUARANTEED PLUMBING FIXTURES

BEFORE the advent of "Standard" Fixtures a sanitary bathroom was a luxury of the rich. Today even the simplest homes enjoy the profit by their refining influence. The moral effect of "Standard" Fixtures has been as great as their beauty, durability and excellence. The beauty, practical utility and quality of "Standard" Fixtures have formed the bathroom standards of the entire world.

Genuine "Standard" fixtures for the Home and for School, Office Buildings, Public Institutions, etc., are identified by the Green and Gold Label, with the exception of one brand of bath bearing the Red and Black Label, which, while of the first quality of manufacture, have a slightly thinner enameling, and thus meet the requirements of those who demand "Standard" quality at less expense. All "Standard" fixtures, with care, will last a life time. And no fixture is genuine unless it bears the guarantee label. In order to avoid substitution of inferior fixtures, specify "Standard" goods in writing (not verbally) and make sure that you get them.

WELL PEOPLE TOO

Wise Doctor Gives Postum to Convalescents

A wise doctor tries to give nature its best chance by saving the little strength of the already exhausted patient, and building up wasted energy with simple but powerful nourishment.

"Five years ago," writes a doctor, "I commenced to use Postum in my own family instead of coffee." (It's a well-known fact that tea is just as injurious as coffee because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.) "I was so well pleased with the results that I had two grocers place it in stock, guaranteeing its sale.

"I then commenced to recommend it to my patients in place of coffee, as a nutritious beverage. The consequence is, every store in town is now selling it, as it has become a household necessity in many homes.

"I'm sure I prescribe Postum as often as any one remedy in the Materia Medica —in almost every case of indigestion and nervousness I treat, and with the best results.

"When I once introduce it into a family, it is quite sure to remain. I shall continue to use it and prescribe it in families where I practice.

"In convalescence from pneumonia, typhoid fever and other cases I give it as a liquid, easily absorbed diet. You may use my letter as a reference any way you see fit. Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

WILSON ACCEPTS NOMINATION

GOVERNOR WILSON, in accepting the Democratic nomination for the presidency, made a remarkably lucid and statesmanlike speech at Sea Girt, N. J., on the afternoon of August 7. Fully 6,000 people crowded the lawn of the "Little White House" to hear his views on the great issues of the day. He spoke from the printed type calmly without passion and without uttering a word of invective or abuse or partisan bitterness against those opposed to him or who have said harsh things of him in the heat of the political agitation of the past few months. The great gathering listened to him with rapt attention, but the proceedings were too impressive for much applause.

After showing that we were on the eve of a new epoch at the beginning of a coming age of moral and national development he turned attention to the tariff, declaring that he was for immediate revision unhesitatingly and steadily downward. As to the currency question, he asserted that the farmers and merchants must be consulted as well as the bankers in regard to the nation's policy of dealing with it. He came out strong for an increase in the merchant marine and made a hit at the large corporations, saying, "Big business is not dangerous because it is big, but because its bigness is an unwholesome inflation created by privileges and exemptions which it ought not to enjoy."

He dealt with every vital problem confronting the nation and proclaimed himself in favor of laws for safeguarding workers and improving labor conditions; conservation not limited to reservation; development of water powers and waterways; revival of merchant marine; a parcels post as complete as that of any other nation; governmental promotion of agricultural, industrial, and vocational education. The peroration of his speech was as follows:

"I could not have accepted a nomination," he declared, "which left me bound to any man or any group of men. No man can be just who is not free and no man who has to show favors ought to undertake the solemn responsibility of government in any rank or post whatever, least of all in the supreme post of President of the United States. To be free is not necessarily to be wise. But wisdom comes with counsel, with the frank and free conference of untrammeled men united in the common interest. Should I be intrusted with the great office of President, I would seek counsel wherever it could be had upon free terms."

Thekla, which rise straight out of the plain to a height of more than 5,000 feet, kept guard over the city to the westward. Then, as now, the soft-footed camels plodded their way, slowly and majestically, through the narrow streets, and knelt in the wood-market to unload their heavy burdens of logs and fagots which they had brought from the mountains. Then, as now, the traders at the little booths in the bazaar, under the brown awnings, sat cross-legged before their small stock of wares, entreating the passerby to stop and purchase. Few of the notable features of the street life have greatly changed, for, in the slow-moving East, customs and costumes and manners remain the same from generation to generation.

In Iconium the apostles received very much the same treatment as in Antioch. A period of favor in which the willing ears of the people were eagerly lent to these new doctrines was followed by a period of coldness, distrust, persecution and final banishment. The character of the city, however, and hence the character of the opposition to the apostles, was different from that of Antioch. Antioch was a free Roman city and the upper classes, the nobility and the rulers, were those who were especially incensed against St. Paul, and finally compassed his banishment. Iconium was an Hellenic city, with no Roman hierarchy, but the unbelieving Jews who were always like bloodhounds on the apostle's track stirred up the rabble in Iconium to perform for them the same service which had been accomplished by the rulers of Antioch. However, it was not until the apostle had lived for a "long time" in Iconium that the hostile Jews prejudiced and inflamed the mob against Paul and Barnabas. "There they abode," we are told, "speaking boldly in the Lord, which gave testimony unto the word of his grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands."

So effective had been their preaching that the whole city had been stirred, and took sides either for or against the new faith. Part held with the Jews and part with the apostles, and when the assault was about to be made, and they knew that they were to be stoned and "used despitefully," they took counsel of prudence and common sense, knowing that their mission was not yet fulfilled, and fled to Lystra, some seven hours farther toward the southeast, whither we shall follow them in another article.

Their banishment from Iconium was not a permanent one. In the same chapter of the Acts we read how they returned again to Iconium, where they found their work had not been in vain, for they confirmed the souls of the disciples, exhorting them to continue in the faith, and "that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." These brave apostles knew full well the meaning of these words. Driven out of Antioch, again driven out of Iconium, they fled to Lystra, where they should receive a persecution more savage, and tribulations still more severe. Yet whether in Antioch, or Iconium, or Lystra, or Derbe, or "in the region that lieth round about," they had but one mission and one message. For there and everywhere, as the simple, unadorned but tremendously effective account of St. Luke tells us, "they preached the Gospel."

The Guardians of Liberty

AS a subscriber and a member of the Guardians of Liberty, I want to thank you for the support you have given them in your issue of June 19 and especially the article of June 26. An organization formed by such a body of men is certainly for a worthy cause and deserves the approval of every Protestant church paper, and it is a discredit upon our daily newspapers that they refuse to give it any space. Thanking you again and trusting it will receive further co-operation and encouragement from the greatest religious weekly, I am, etc.,

A Grand Book by Margaret Sangster!

Twilight Tales

Twenty-four Delightful Stories of Love and Romance From Real Life

THOSE who already know the rare literary charm of Margaret Sangster's writings will welcome this volume—the last perfect product of her wonderful talent. Twilight Tales comes almost as a parting message from one who has been greatly beloved by countless multitudes, and whose contributions for many years in the pages of The Christian Herald have made her name a household word.

Mrs. Sangster's remarkable power of sympathy and of sounding the depths of human feeling is evident in every one of these twenty-four complete stories. She is never so much the mistress of her art as when relating in her own inimitable way the progress of some love match in simple life, some idyl of the farm or the village, or a romance of the cottage, the garden, or the orchard. An ardent lover of nature in all its moods, she has put into these Tales the true atmosphere of American rural life as it is to-day, with all its charm of changeful season and its panorama of flowery lanes, ripening fruits and waving fields. Her heroes are fine types of manly character, and her women have the sweet and comely fascination, mental and physical, which we love to associate with the daintiest idea of American womanhood.

TWILIGHT TALES
Twenty-Four Stories of Love and Romance from Real Life
BY MARGARET SANGSTER
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
Bible House, New York

This photograph shows the cover of the book in miniature. The actual size of the book is 5¼ in. wide by 7¾ in. long.

There is a thread of pure gold running through the Twilight Tales from which the reader may divine the author's purpose in writing the book. It is the line of God's protecting love and care which encircles all who trust in Him, and the knowledge of which gives to even the smallest detail of everyday life a purpose and significance. She spreads before us the little daily dramas, the heartaches, the disappointments, the sweet surprises and unexpected joys, the separations and the reunions, the cares and consolations of the household, the "journeys that end in lovers' meeting"—all are unrolled like a moving picture, with the vivid action of life itself. Mrs. Sangster has crowded the best heart and soul stories of her whole career into this book. Love, romance, self-denial, ambition and the success that true character commands are here pictured with a fragrant setting of American home-life in town and country. It is a book which will exert a strong spell on the mind of the reader and which creates its own atmosphere of woodlands and old-fashioned gardens and charming American homes, and her men and women are such as we love to meet.

HAPPY COZY CORNER DAYS

MODEL AEROPLANES—ARTICLE NO. II

By Francis A. Collins, Author of "The Boys' Book of Model Aeroplanes"

THE improvement in model gliders during the past year has been even more remarkable than that of the large man-carrying machines. From the toy which would fly 200 feet has been developed a marvelous air craft which flies for more than half a mile. The new models are much lighter and simpler this year, and therefore easier to build. The principles of flight are besides so much better understood to-day than they were a year ago that any boy can readily master the problems and be sure of making long flights.

The frames or motor bases of the new model aeroplanes are fascinating bits of construction. In place of the rather cumbrous frames used a year ago, the most successful model builders now use a simple contrivance of sticks weighing scarcely more than an ounce. It will be found a good plan to build one of these frames very carefully, and use the same design, even should you change the size and position of the planes or wings. By keeping to the same design of frame you will soon become skilful in constructing it, and will perhaps make improvements upon the form here described.

A frame thirty inches in length will be found a good workable size. Secure three strips of some straight-grained light wood, such as spruce, about three-eighths of an inch square. Two of these should be cut in thirty-inch lengths, the third a foot in length. Later these strips may be planed and sandpapered down perhaps an eighth of an inch both ways. The idea is to construct a triangular frame strong enough to resist the pull of the rubber bands of the motor when wound up. Your construction may prove so rigid that the strips may be reduced to a quarter of an inch square.

Now cut away or bevel one side of each stick a distance of an inch at the end so that the strips will form a neat angle, and glue and tie them firmly together. Wrap them tightly with strong thread and touch the wrapping with glue. The triangle is completed by securely fastening the cross-piece on base to the ends of the two long sticks, so that it will have a spread of about ten inches, leaving an inch extending out at either side. There are several ways of fastening the sticks together. We would suggest slightly mortising the longer sticks and gluing and binding the parts together. Be careful not to cut away enough to weaken the frame. Brace the frame with several cross-pieces, using bamboo if possible.

Next prepare two planes, the larger twenty by three inches, the smaller one eight inches by two inches. The simplest plane to make, and one of the best, is cut from a thin piece of board, about one-eighth of an inch thick. Sandpaper it carefully and bevel the edges. Now cover the plane by binding with a tough muslin, gluing it to the surface and pulling it tightly over the edges. This will protect it from cracking when landing.

This model aeroplane travels with the point forward. Fasten the smaller plane rigidly across at the apex of the triangle, tying it with rubber bands. These allow it to be moved backward and forward. The larger plane should be fastened on the same side about six inches from the base stick. This will be construction enough for the present. We will leave the propellers and motors for another week. For the present you should practice throwing the model as a glider, moving the larger plane back and forth until you have just the right position, when the model will soar on an even keel.

FEEDING THE BIRD

Do You Know This?

IF you want your garden to be beautiful during all the rest of the summer and far into the autumn as well, do not let the drought that is apt to be very general at the end of August catch it. Give every plant, shrub and vine plenty of water at this season and you will have abundance of green foliage and flowers for six weeks longer. Cut the blossoming plants back about one-third, and do not spare the new shoots. Then soak the soil plentifully with a solution made of two ounces of nitrate of soda to every three gallons of water. The plants will pick up wonderfully and be covered again with fine healthy leaves and blossoms. Try it. You will be both surprised and delighted with the result.

GRACE FOR A CHILD

What God gives, and what we take.
'Tis a gift for Christ His sake:
Be the meale of Beanes and Pease,
God be thank'd for those and these;
Have we flesh, or have we fish,
All are Fragments from His dish.
Here a little child I stand,
Heaving up my either hand,
Asking that Thy Blessing fall
On our meat, and on us all.

ROBERT HERRICK (1591).

The answer to the puzzle in the Cozy Corner of August 7 is: "March." Miriam H. Field, age 16, of Springfield, Mass., won first prize for answer and best letter accompanying it. The prize is a beautiful book entitled Deeds of Daring Done by Girls.

Among the features of next week's Cozy Corner will be an article to older girls, entitled, "Is He the Man, I Wonder?" and a new puzzle for everybody.

Lovingly and faithfully yours,

A Soldier's Poem

HEARING

HOW I love to hear of Jesus,
For he is God's only Son,
Who by his blood on Calvary
Us back to God has won.
How I love to hear him whisper
To my often weary soul;
Yes; I love to hear of Jesus,
For 'tis he who makes me whole.

THINKING

How I love to think of Jesus,
And his thoughtfulness for me;
Think how he was tried and tempted
Just to give me liberty.
In his love he gave his Spirit,
Which by faith now dwells within.
Yes; I love to think of Jesus,
For he saves me from all sin.

SPEAKING

How I love to speak of Jesus,
And his loving, tender care;
How I love to tell the weary
He will grief and burdens share.
How I love to tell the tempted
There is grace for every need;
Yes; I love to tell of Jesus,
Who my soul from sin has freed.

WORKING

How I love to live for Jesus,
Although in a small, small way;
How I love to serve and trust him,
And shine brightly every day.
Where he leads, I love to follow
To my best ability;
This I gladly do for Jesus,
Who has done so much for me.

JUST A LITTLE LOVE

JUST a little love here, just a little help there,
Makes this world go better everywhere;
Just a little smile here, just a little tear there,
Helps somebody else his load to bear.

Just a little word here, just a little song there,
Lifts from heavy hearts their weight of care;
Just a little cheer here, just a little hope there,
Drives away the cloud of dark despair.

Just a little trust here, just a little faith there,
And the world a brighter face shall wear;
Just a little day here, just a little night there,
Then eternal life with God we'll share.

An Auto Wagon Travels At Less Expense Per Mile Than a Driving Team

AN International Auto Wagon costs little if any more than any good driving team, buggy and light wagon. With reasonable care it will last as long as the team will stand up to the work of the road. The maintenance cost of the International Auto Wagon is low because of the small expense necessary to keep up solid tires. About a cent and a half a mile for gasoline and oil, a cent a mile for grease and possible repairs—say three and a half cents a mile for all maintenance—is considerably less than the usual cost of keeping a road team.

An International Auto Wagon

will go anywhere that a team can go and will travel two to three times as fast. It costs nothing to keep when not working. It is a steady, every-day, all-day-long worker, with power enough to meet any emergency. It is simple—any member of your family can learn to drive it. The brakes are powerful—safe on any hill. The springs are resilient, making the car easy-riding. There is an auxiliary spring to take care of heavy loads.

The International Auto Wagon is quickly converted from a wagon for light hauling to a pleasure car, by the addition of an extra seat in the back. A top is furnished for protection from sun and storm.

Give us an opportunity to show you how many business trips this car will make for you, how much pleasure it will give your family, and at what little expense it will do it. A postal will bring catalogues and full information.

Eat Them Just for Joy

Forget that Puffed Grains are an expert's invention—the last word of science in ease of digestion.

Eat them as nuts are eaten—just for the joy of eating—for their airy crispness, for their fascinating taste.

The Joyous Facts About Foods Shot From Guns

Ten Thousand Cells Formed by Steam Explosion

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are simply steam-exploded grains.

The moisture within them is turned to steam, in a terrific heat, then exploded.

Every food granule is thus blasted to pieces, and a myriad cells are formed.

Each cell is surrounded by thin, toasted walls, which melt at the touch of moisture.

The grains are puffed to eight times normal size—made four times as porous as bread.

Curious Creations

Each grain is a puffed, airy wafer, like no other food you know. Each is a magnified kernel, shaped as it grew, for the coats of the grain are unbroken.

They are whole-grain foods made wholly digestible. No element is lacking.

One would never dream that such dainty morsels could be made from unground grain.

Like Toasted Nuts

The grains in the guns are subjected to a heat of 550 degrees for an hour. That's how we create the steam pressure. Because of that heat, the exploded grains taste much like toasted nuts.

They are used like nuts in candy making—in frosting cake—in garnishing ice cream.

Served in any way you like them, the grains suggest nut meats, made porous and crisp and digestible. There lies their main enchantment.

Questions and Answers

R. S. P., Winnipeg, Man. Please explain Metempsychosis.

Metempsychosis is the doctrine of the transmigration of souls or the belief that the soul after the death of the body passes into some soulless creature, one of the lower animals or even a tree or plant. It is very ancient. The Egyptian priests taught that the spirit remained on earth three thousand years before being admitted to the abode of happiness. The Brahmanical Hindus believed that the soul passed through body after body, becoming higher with each incarnation until it was fit to merge into God; while the Buddhists are of the opinion that each change from body to body brings purification, until Nirvana is reached, which, despite many hairsplitting attempts at distinction, Western minds cannot understand other than as annihilation. The great Greek philosopher, Pythagoras, treated of the doctrine, as did also Thales of Miletus. Of modern thinkers who leaned towards the belief may be mentioned Lessing in Germany and Pierre Leroux and Jean Reynaud in France.

J. B., Roy, S. D. Please explain Acts 2: 1-4; John 14: 16, 17; John 15: 26; John 16: 13. Is the Holy Spirit referred to in the Old Testament, and if so by what name?

The passages you mention refer to the coming of the Holy Spirit to the earth in a new way to do a new work. The Holy Spirit is mentioned in the Old Testament, usually by the term, "Spirit of God." But on the day of Pentecost the Holy Spirit came to inaugurate a new dispensation; he came to apply the effects of Christ's life, mission and death to human hearts, to keep the memory of Christ fresh in the hearts of those who had known him and to make him real to those who had never known him; he came to fill and strengthen and guide individual believers and the whole Church of Christ.

K. S. K., Cleveland, O. When and by whom was time divided into days, hours and minutes?

From the remotest antiquity men have observed the movements of the sun and heavenly bodies, which movements regulate the divisions of time. The first great natural division, the day, was the measure of the diurnal course of the sun from point to point (meridian to meridian), causing light and darkness, day and night. It is claimed that the Babylonians were the first to divide the day into hours and minutes, but equal claims are put forward for the Chaldeans and Egyptians and even the Chinese.

M. J. W., Holland, Mich. I would like to know in what way we can best oppose the growth of Roman Catholic authority in the nation's affairs.

Publicity is the best and most available means of combating it. The American people needs to be enlightened by a thorough campaign of education, showing the results of Romanist political domination in other lands, France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Portugal and England, and how practically all of the European countries have shaken off the grasp of Rome in temporal affairs.

O. E. G., New Haven, O. 1. How may we tell the difference between the accusations of the devil and the reproofs of the Holy Spirit? 2. How can we drive the evil spirit away? 3. How may one receive the assurance that he is a child of God? 4. Can a person be a child of God and not be satisfied with his experience? 5. Can a person be unhappy if he is truly a child of God?

1. The promptings of the Holy Spirit are always in accord with the Scriptures; they are always reasonable; they are always plain and definite. The evil spirit, on the other hand, is vague, puzzling, unsettling in his suggestions. 2. He is driven away by an appeal to the Word of God, as the Saviour demonstrated in his own temptation, and by faith in the name of Jesus. There must be firm resistance. James says: "Resist the evil one and he will flee from you." (James 4: 7.) 3. The assurance that we are saved comes in answer to faith. We must really trust Christ to forgive us and accept us, and as we trust the assurance comes. But the faith always precedes the assurance. We must not wait for feeling, but believe first, and as we trust, the restful asurance will come that God receives us. As we go out bravely and briskly to work for Christ in helping others, we shall find that the doubts are kept away. 4. Many children of God are not satisfied with their experience. They are always longing for more of God. But the Christian may certainly have peace. Many Christians have found that by a definite consecration of themselves to Christ and by definite faith in his blood to cleanse them and faith in God to fill them with the Holy Spirit, they have been led to an experience of new joy and power. This is undoubtedly promised in the Word of God. 5. Sorrow comes at times to every Christian. The Bible does not promise us freedom from sorrows, but it does promise us grace to bear them. Our griefs and trials should make us strong and brave. Nothing need ever separate us from Christ (see Rom. 8: 35-39). While we are conscious of his presence any grief may be endured, and may be made to strengthen our character and increase our usefulness.

J. R. C., Covington, Ky. How does an explorer make an observation?

He finds his latitude by measuring the altitude of one of the heavenly bodies, sun, moon, star, planet. This is done with a little instrument called a sextant, graduated for observation and provided with mirrors so arranged that while looking direct at the line of the horizon the observer can cause the image of the heavenly body to move down until it touches the horizon; then the graduated circle of the sextant shows at a glance the angle through which the image has been moved and that gives its elevation above the horizon. The visible horizon answers for the purpose at sea, but on land generally the explorer has to use an artificial horizon, which usually consists of a trough of quicksilver or treacle or something similar which is carefully leveled and in which the image of the heavenly body is reflected. In the case of the sun the angle between the sun as seen direct through the sextant and its image reflected in the quicksilver or treacle is just twice the altitude of the sun above the real horizon. Longitude is the distance east or west from the first meridian, which for the United States and Great Britain is that passing through Greenwich; therefore, the difference between Greenwich time and that of the place to be reckoned, as determined by the chronometer, which reduced to degrees, minutes and seconds, gives the longitude sought, east or west.

P. D. S., Omaha, Neb. I have read of a minister giving a homily. What is a homily?

A homily is a short ministerial talk to a congregation in the nature more or less of a conversational discourse with no pretension to style or oratory as in a sermon.

K. S. A., Meriden, Conn. Where were the most destructive earthquakes and when did they occur?

The Messina-Reggio earthquake of 1908 is probably the most destructive on record, 200,000 lives being lost and cities and towns wiped out of existence. In 1703 nearly as many perished in an earthquake at Yeddo (Japan); in 1731 Peking (China) was visited with a loss of 100,000; in 1883 in the earthquake and volcanic outburst at Krakatoa (Sunda Strait) 35,000 lives were lost.

HOW THEY ARE WAGING WAR ON FLIES IN TEXAS

A CONTINENT-WIDE crusade against the disease-carrying house-fly is now in progress. In many States, Boards of Health have issued instructions warning the public against the ravages of this disseminator of filth and infection. The public schools are co-operating in the spread of information on the subject. In a number of States, a sharp competition is going on with the view of hastening the destruction of these insects, and rewards have been offered to those who take the most effective measures in fighting the pest. In the photograph on this page, a conical wire fly-trap is shown, which has been effective in destroying tens of thousands of the disease-carriers. These traps, set over a dish of molasses or sugar-water, attract the flies, and once in the trap, they cannot escape. A simple means of ridding the room of flies is the use of pyrethrum, which may be obtained in the drug stores. It is blown through a tube and the room is then closed. In a few hours the flies are found scattered dead along the floor. Another effective device is a "swatter," made of a piece of fine wire screen-mesh, fastened on a stick. The best means of getting rid of flies is to keep the grounds and house free from garbage. Refuse is a breeding place of flies. Entomologists have discovered that a house-fly on an average lays 120 eggs, which mature in ten days. The second generation, ten days later, is capable of producing 14,400 flies, the third generation 1,728,000, and the fourth generation 207,360,000 flies, and this from a single progenitor in forty days. A medical authority writes that flies killed more soldiers in the Spanish-American War than the Spanish bullets did. The fly carries the germs of yellow fever, cholera, smallpox, typhoid, tuberculosis and many other diseases.

Vina, M. S., Meekton, Colo. To whom did Peter refer in John 21: 21?

Four verses, beginning with verse 20, must be read to get the full import of the incident. Peter's end the Master had already foretold (verses 18, 19), and now that disciple, seeing that Jesus gave especial evidence of his affection for John, asked the direct interrogatory concerning the fate which should befall the "beloved disciple." Jesus' rebuke in verses 21, 22 seems to have been accepted by the disciples as a prediction that John would not die, but would live to witness the Second Coming which was then believed to be at hand after certain things had been accomplished. As John was the only one of the twelve who survived the destruction of Jerusalem and who witnessed the events connected with the first great development of the kingdom, there are many commentators who interpret it as a prophecy as well as a rebuke.

Mrs. G. E., Larkinburg, Kan. Which one of the twelve apostles did Jesus appoint first?

The accounts of the choosing of the twelve in Mark 3: 13-19 and Luke 6: 12-16, mention Peter (or Simon) as the first. Peter's name is also first in the list of the apostles given in Matt. 10: 2-4.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. P. A. L., Skaneateles, N. Y. A husband is bound to support his wife and children, and the courts will compel him to do so. The wife cannot be prevented from keeping boarders to support herself. A girl of seventeen years of age cannot marry without the consent of her parents.

G. K., Delta, O. 1. Presbyterian. 2. The clergyman chosen to open a convention by prayer is selected with the approval of the National Committee.

Mrs. E. M., West Bolton, Vt. By all means you should join the church. The other questions you ask are wholly controversial and do not touch the essentials of religion. We thank you for your kindly appreciation.

M. A. H., Lemon Grove, Calif. Nearly all the States have local option in some form, either county or State, Pennsylvania and New Jersey being the only exceptions. The prohibition States are Maine, Kansas, North Dakota, North Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, Oklahoma and Georgia.

B. H., Tuscola, Mich., sends this suggestion: "Why not start a World's Prayer Meeting, to be held on Saturday and Sunday of each week, and all approximately at the same hour? It would be a great human wireless communication, blending our petitions, and it would do a great deal of good to have all Christian people on earth unite in praying for what they need in the different parts of the earth.

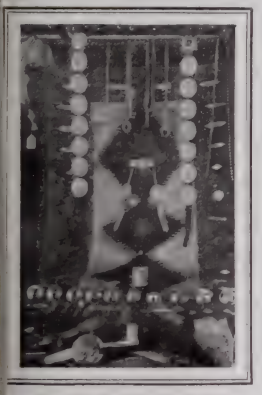
THE JOYS OF THE HARVEST TIME

BY JOHN L. COWAN



Native Indian Jewelry at the Shiprock Navajo Fair

IN SOME part of this big country, every month is a harvest month, so that somewhere the country fair or harvest festival is always in season. The first celebration of the year comes on New Year's Day, when Southern California makes merry over the gathering of the orange crop, at Pasadena's famous Tournament of Roses. Through the winter and spring California has many similar floral festivals and numerous citrus fairs, wherever the orange and grapefruit, lemon, olive and other products of semi-tropical regions flourish. In June, when the great deciduous fruit crops of the Pacific Northwest begin to ripen, comes Portland's Rose Carnival—doubtless the most spectacular of American floral fiestas.

By that time the harvest season has begun in the South and Southwest, followed in succession by the Middle West, the Rocky Mountain region, the Dakotas and Minnesota and distant New England. From June until October agricultural exhibitions, with their accompaniments of horse races, side shows, and general spirit of happy good-fellowship, hold the field in rural districts against all other forms of entertainment. When November's winds begin to blow, the ingathering of the harvests has been completed throughout the major part of the Union, and the President's Thanksgiving proclamation calls for a nation-wide feast, a football game in every community that can muster enough husky youths to make up opposing elevens, and everything under the sun to eat in celebration of the plentiful harvests. Even after that date the cotton crop of the South must be gathered, and the negro cotton pickers make merry in their own fashion, which may take the form of a camp-meeting and religious revival, or of a cake-walk and general jollification. The great fiesta of the Western cotton belt is the "No-Tsu-Oh" festival, at Houston, Texas. Through November and December there are agricultural fairs and carnivals in the far Southwest, and in California, where almost every month is a harvest month for one or another of the State's products.

The Rocky Mountain States have their special fête days, timed to occur when their crops are harvested and safely garnered away. Some of these occur in connection with agricultural fairs, while others have no such accompaniment; but all are notable in that they insure to all comers a full stomach; for in the estimation of the people of the West a good dinner is an essential part of all good times.

First of these harvest fêtes is Glenwood's Strawberry Day, when all visitors, for at least once in their lives, may eat to satiety of the luscious berries for which that little town in the heart of the Colorado Rockies is far-famed. Later in the season come Longmont's Pumpkin Pie Day, Greeley's Potato Roast, Loveland's Corn Roast, Brighton's Tomato Battle, Rockyford's Melon Day, Grand Junction's Peach Day, Gunnison's Fish Fry, and others not so well known. At Cheyenne, on the occasion of the annual Frontier Days' celebration, the feast is omitted, but the spirit of the Old West is reanimated to strut once more around the race track for the edification of the vast majority, to whom the cowboy is only a story-book tradition, and the overland stage and prairie schooner matters of ancient and dubious history. In order to catch the eye and excite the imagination, there are street parades, in which Indians and buxom artificially tanned cowgirls are much in evidence. Then there are burro races, pony-races, bronco-busting contests, fake stage-coach hold-ups, and other features that the West feels constrained to maintain for the sake of tradition.

A Tempting Fruit Display at a Western Fair

County fairs and State fairs are painfully alike in all parts of the country. Ostensibly they are educational institutions for the interchange of ideas, the dissemination of knowledge and the encouragement of agriculture. Enterprising manufacturers of agricultural implements and all sorts of tools and devices used on the farm have found them useful for the display of their wares for advertising purposes.

Though each may take time to hunt up his pet hobby—be it poultry, sheep, shorthorns or mangles—most farmers and country people attend the fair with little thought of instruction and with no desire for profit, but solely in order to be amused. As a rule, the real, simon-pure farmer soon sees what interests him in the exhibits of farm machinery,

SCHOOL WORKING BEES

Weighing School-Farm Cotton

Dinner Time Is a Picnic

Many Hands Make Light Work

SOME three years ago the deplorable condition of the public school system in the little town of Holly Springs, N. C., aroused the women of the town to effort, and as a first step in the progress of reform they organized the "School Betterment Association," and at once set about raising funds for the education of the children. There was no school land for public use, no building, not even a shelter where a school could be held, they thought at first. But the town had known better things, and earnest search revealed a dismantled old building which had once housed the "Holly Springs Academy," and here, when the first floor had been put into habitable condition, a small school was opened and supported by voluntary contributions.

To keep the school running and the teacher's salary paid was no light task, and when some one suggested that the large lot which constituted the academy grounds might be cultivated and made to produce a revenue, the ladies accepted the idea with enthusiasm. They at once undertook to enlist the aid of the most progressive farmers in the community, and with the help of Mr. Z. V. Judd, county superintendent of public instruction, they succeeded in this and also in securing donations of fertilizers, seed and all the other requisites. The heavy work was done by unenthusiastic husbands, while the ladies, assisted by the teacher and the children, made war on the weeds.

The method of planting, cultivating, gathering and marketing was dictated by the best farmer in the region, and he also acted as supervisor. Under his direction, two acres of land were plowed, fertilized and put in proper shape, cotton seed was tested and planted, and the best machinery was used. The cotton grew and flourished, and the neighborhood, always interested in things which interest the children, began "to take notice." From far and near came men with their wives and children, all ready to lend a hand, and it was not long till a name developed and these meetings were called "Working Bees."

The social side was a natural outgrowth, for the workers must be fed. They brought their lunches, and at first it was a basket picnic, but to eat together was pleasanter, and soon long tables were constructed and all gathered about in harmonious intercourse. "Many hands" quickly performed the necessary labor, and by noon everybody was ready to do ample justice to housewifely provision. Games followed in the afternoon—tennis, baseball, races and other sports; or sometimes the exercises of the school, or little addresses by such authorities as could be had. Prejudice and indifference began to give way, and men were glad to vary the monotony of country life with these "School Working Bees." They soon realized that in observing the methods of the supervisor, and in the exchange of views among themselves, they had gained new and helpful ideas. The school farm was educating the farmers and they liked it.

This was encouraging, and the Holly Springs School Farm became an established institution. The town now has a $7,200 brick school house, four teachers, an eight months term, a three-year high school course, with a domestic science class of twenty girls, and a school garden in which are raised all the vegetables used by the class. This effort on the part of the women, assisted by the wide-awake county superintendent, has had a far-reaching effect, for it has not only enlisted the interest of its own people, but, Mr. Judd believes, has also solved the problem of arousing sympathy and co-operation in rural communities. There are now seventeen school farms in Wake County alone, and the movement bids fair to take the State and the neighboring States. Professor Monahan, assistant director of rural education, who has devoted much time and study to the question, believes that these schools will become the means of a general uplift of conditions in rural districts, where parents have no conception of the value of an education, and where little is now done for children.

The plan is to establish farms of two to ten acres, in each of which some country school shall be interested, though sometimes one farm, midway between two schools, may be cared for by two districts working together. The best farming methods known will be put in use, a system of crop rotation suitable to each locality determined upon, and incidentally the farmers and their children will learn many things about up-to-date, scientific farming.

The public schoolhouse, now a structure of comparatively little social use to the community, will become a great light, radiating information and uplifting thought, leading every farmer's child not only to cultivate his mind, but also to appreciate the work of his own hands, to delight in the growing fields, and to find in his own environment—his own home—a new beauty and harmony.

fruits, vegetables and live stock. Among such things as these he spends his days of toil, and on Fair Day he is after novelty, and when he has seen what there is of that, he looks for amusement. He pilots his wife and mother-in-law to the jams, jellies, bread, butter and fancy-work exhibits, steers his sons over to the lung-testers, photograph and tintype galleries, and then hies joyfully away to the tented street whereon are the curved mirrors, the five-legged calf, the fortune-telling parrots, the tatooed man, the snake charmer and half a hundred other familiar Midway features.

In all this there is no hint or suggestion of the religious origin of fairs. Yet, as a matter of history, we know that the great fairs of Europe were, in the beginning, purely religious gatherings. Later, merchants began to take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded for the display of their wares to vast crowds of people, assembled from widely separated regions; and the fairs became commercialized.

However, the character of the fair as a festival of the harvest time is still preserved; so that its kinship with harvest festivals known by other names must be recognized. Its origin is grounded deep in the heart of man and the good brown earth. It antedates all religions and all social organization, springing from the joy of the harvest. The first farmer must have rejoiced when he found that the fruits of his labor were sufficient for his needs. After this rejoicing must have come the giving of thanks to the unseen powers that caused the sun to give its light and heat, that made the rains to fall that the seeds might germinate and the plants grow to maturity and ripen.

It gives us a new conception of the solidarity of the human race to realize the fact that the barbarous rites of the Indian snake dancers, the county fairs and clam bakes of New England, the floral fiestas of the Pacific Coast and colored camp meetings of the South, the ancient Hebrew offering of the first fruits, and the harvest festivals of the peasantry of Europe, China and India, all spring from the same instinct to rejoice in the sufficiency of the fruits of the earth and to give thanks to the powers that gave them.

In America it is only among the agricultural tribes of Indians that the original religious significance of the harvest festival has been retained. Among the Pueblo Indians of the community of Taos in northern New Mexico, the great tribal fiesta takes place September 30 of each year. This celebration is noted for its spectacular ceremonial dances and for its ceremony of climbing the greased pole. Upon the top of the pole is tied a live sheep, a live rooster and a basket containing specimens of every variety of fruit, grain and vegetable produced in the neighborhood. The victor in the pole-climbing contest cuts loose the trophies and casts them down to the waiting crowd. Then follow offerings to the gods of the harvest and a feast to all who care to share the bounty of the tribe's people.

If the bureau of Indian Affairs has its way, it will not be long until the tribal festivals of the harvest to which the red men still cling become but a tradition. The first Indian fair was held in 1905 on the Crow agency in Montana. Every year since then, the Crow Fair has been growing in interest and importance. It attracted the attention not only of bureau officials in Washington but of all others interested in the progress of the Indians toward citizenship. Three years ago Superintendent W. T. Shelton, of the Shiprock Agency, in New Mexico, first tried the experiment among the Navajos. It proved an unqualified success among the members of that tribe also.

It is hoped that the general introduction of the agricultural fair among the Indian tribes will not only encourage agriculture but that it will supplant the tribal dances and fiestas to which the tribesmen cling with all the tenacity of fanaticism. The tribal dance and harvest fiesta are religious observances in honor of the old nature gods. So long as these endure, paganism must continue to flourish. But if the agricultural fair can be made to take the place of the tribal dance and other pagan ceremonies, it is hoped that the old gods will soon be forgotten.

MOSTAPHA, THE MOSLEM MUEZZIN

BY REV. J. C. HARTZELL, M. E. BISHOP OF AFRICA
AND WALTER J. YATES, PH.D.

Mostapha's Minaret

FROM his earliest boyhood he had known the mosque almost as well as he knew his father's house. When very small, in playing with the other barefoot boys in the streets, they often came into the square on which it fronted and heard the call of the muezzin from the minaret above the roof. He would watch the sober-faced men as they went in to prayers, and creeping close up to the doors would peer into the interior. Its columns and ornamentation caught his boyish fancy, and he came to regard it as the most wonderful place, as well as the most holy one, on earth. And was not this wonderful city of Constantine where he lived the greatest and holiest spot on earth? He had never heard of Mecca, nor would he have understood if he had heard. As he grew older, he would curl himself up in a heap in some nook of the bazaar when he saw the strolling minstrels from the desert reciting or singing their religious songs to a company squatted cross-legged on the pavement or sitting sedately on the benches at the sides of the street. He also liked to listen to the discussions of the old men as they sipped their coffee, smoked and disputed about the Prophet, and Moslem customs, and their religion. What interested him most, however, was the muezzin, who five times a day called from far over the mosque roof to the followers of the Prophet to pray to Allah. The mystery of the call added to its fascination. The minaret could not be seen from the square. There was only one place, down a narrow side alley, where it could be seen from the ground. How did the muezzin get up there? Who told him to do it? Why was he always alone? These and a lot of other questions bothered Mostapha. If he could get on top of one of the houses he could see it all. When he grew to be a man he would do it. So the years passed. Mostapha was taught the Koran, as every Moslem boy must be. Three duties every Moslem father must perform for his son. He must teach him obedience and the Koran, and must secure his marriage. Mostapha's father faithfully performed the first two, but died before his boy was old enough to be married. The mother was left with three sons, of whom Mostapha was the oldest. The support of the family fell on him. No small burden in any land, and especially heavy in Moslem North Africa. Fortunately their tastes were simple, their health was good, their actual needs few, and the people around them were as poor as themselves.

Mostapha must work. That was clear. But what could he do to earn money? Now the half-formed dream of boyhood took shape. He would be a muezzin, and from the minaret of the mosque call to prayer all the faithful. It was a startling idea to his family, but so perfectly natural to him that at last he won their consent and secured the place and was put in training. A happy day it was to him when for the first time he climbed the long flight of narrow stairs alone and from the balcony of the minaret gave the call in a strong, clear voice, heard in the busy streets and far up on the rocky crags of the surrounding hills.

He was faithful and devoted to his duties and rapidly gained friends among the influential men of the city. While things were in this prosperous condition an incident occurred which changed his whole life course. Going to the mosque one day he passed a house where he heard singing different from anything to which he was accustomed. It was not Moslem, though the words were Arabic, and the song was a religious one. The voice was European, and the tune was entirely new in character. He was familiar with the weird chanting of the minstrels and their religious songs, which were always tinged with licentiousness if not openly lewd, as they sang on the streets and in the cafés. This new song was about Jesus Christ and trust in him. He understood the words, but what they referred to was a deep mystery to him. The joyous tone of the music attracted him; it was so unlike anything he had ever known. But it perplexed him. Was not Mohammed the true Prophet, and were not all his followers sure of salvation? How then could Jesus Christ be the Saviour of the world, as these people sang? He resented the placing of Jesus Christ above the Prophet, when all the world knew he was not his equal. He was stirred and angry at these newcomers for their false teaching, and the more so because the singing was so very pleasing. He went past the house again and heard them praying and reading some sacred book, but not the Koran; and then they talked about this new religion and of loving God. That was a thought entirely new to him. He watched the people come out. They were fine-looking and very intelligent. The women mingled freely with the men, and yet it was clear to be seen that they were not immoral women, though not veiled. And the women sang, prayed and talked as well as the men. Strangest of all, they seemed to enjoy their religion. He did not understand it at all.

Later, he learned that these people were teaching the common boys of the streets to read and sing and do some useful work, and the girls also who would come to them. Such absurdity! Trying to teach a girl anything! But the girls did learn to read and sing and sew and do a lot of things he had never supposed they could do. Finally, one of the missionaries, who had noticed him as he often stopped and listened near the corner, spoke to him and invited him to come inside. Of course he would not go. He, a Moslem muezzin! But he did talk with the Christian, asking questions and arguing for the Moslem faith. It came about that they met quite frequently. The missionary was wise and knew the truth was working in the mind and heart of the muezzin, though Mostapha neither knew it nor would he have acknowledged it if he had known. The result was inevitable with one of Mostapha's make-up. Gradually he came to know the truth and to realize that Jesus was the only Saviour, and that he needed salvation through Him. He sought and found it. Then came the crisis of his life. What should he do? Could he break with all his old life and his people and declare himself Christian? If he did, how could he support the family? The struggle was long and severe, but he at length boldly declared himself Christian, and was baptized. This made a sensation in Moslem circles, and all possible means were taken to induce him to return to the faith of his fathers, but he held firm. After a time, his younger brothers followed him into the Christian Church. His mother is a woman of more than ordinary strength of character. She approves the action of her sons, but will not become Christian herself. Perhaps the social and family influences and tradition are yet too strong for her.

Mostapha's Sister and Her Children

The Mosque at Constantine

These changes were not made without grave troubles, however. The sister was married and had two beautiful children. Her husband at once divorced her and sent her and her children from his house, refusing to do anything for their support. Now, no Moslem woman of the better class, especially if divorced, can by any means earn her living in a Mohammedan country except by a life of degradation.

Mostapha's sister is an unusually bright and attractive woman of about twenty years of age. Having been brought up in the regular Mohammedan fashion, she had never received such training as would qualify her to undertake her own support and that of her children in any of the ways that, in similar circumstances, would present themselves to an American or European woman of the same social class. The situation was pathetic and almost tragic; but Mostapha met it bravely and took his sister and the little ones back to his mother's house. He must now support them also, and the addition of three to the family made a difference not to be lightly reckoned with. Mostapha's sister has not yet become a Christian, but is cast off by all her husband's people socially as well as religiously.

Training Class at Constantine—Mostapha Standing at the Right

What then of Mostapha? His training in the mosque made him a valuable helper to the missionaries. His knowledge of ten thousand details of daily life, his inborn knowledge of the Oriental mind, his familiarity with the city and its life all conspired to make him an ideal native assistant for the missionary workers. He was employed by them and gradually trained for the new work. He went through the villages as a colporteur, selling Bibles and portions of the Scriptures. This led to argument and finally to short addresses and sermons. He had skill in teaching the younger men and boys, and so he was employed in the school work. He was in due time made a local preacher. At the last session of the conference in Tunis, in February, 1912, he was regularly appointed by Bishop Hartzell as an assistant to the missionaries in his native city of Constantine.

Mostapha, the Moslem muezzin, has become a Christian teacher and preacher.

THE JOY OF ACTIVE SERVICE

A SERMON

BY

Rev. W. Jasper Howell*

TEXT: "I press toward the mark." Phil. 3: 14. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Matt. 7: 16. "Be ye doers, and not hearers only." James 1: 22

YESTERDAY can never satisfy youth nor the middle-aged. The inner self cries out, "Give me to-morrow." Not "what I now am," but rather "what I may yet become," is the only goal acceptable to a normal and right-thinking person. The grandeur of the human spirit is that it can elevate itself above itself. Moral growth is from within and outward. Motive and conduct are joint architects in the erection of that building called personality.

The chief hope of the soul is the certainty of growth. The possibilities of to-morrow stir every man in his daily struggles to reach nobility. Take away the goal, and all effort ceases. The acorn is a future oak, but not till after the storms of many winters. So a child after the experiences of the many testing years of development is the stalwart man. Even the world's greatest philosopher once struggled to learn his letters. It is a long distance from learning to spell and to read till one finds himself an author of books that people gratefully read. So it is in the moral realm. But the letters—possibility and doing—can be used in writing the great sentence—a life growing in goodness. Even in this world, "it doth not yet appear what we shall be." The duty urged upon the hearer ought to be—to lead a life of doing. It is not the hearer, but the doer of the word, who has the secret of his Saviour. Jesus said, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." Every laboratory, every microscope and telescope tells us of forces at work. Even continents grow. Progress is the preachment of scientists.

The Watchword of Progress

Growth is the watchword in both the physical and the spiritual life. The seed of life—whether material or ideal—requires growth. Environment prevails in the former, but personal effort alone characterizes a human being. Character is the result of doing.

Doing is the expression in conduct of the ideal within. Whenever the ideal changes, the outer action also changes. But often religious forms, ceremonies and creeds refuse to change, even if the inner ideal has perished or entirely changed. Institutions and customs are more fixed than the external actions of one individual. Religion is of the inner spirit. Without the kernel, the outer form and ritual is a shell—lifeless and mechanical. The expansive is the only growing life—the life worth living. Poetry already written can never express all the future aspirations of men's hearts. New poetry must be written. The pulsating life of ideals in men's hearts like a swelling river must overflow the narrow channel. Even godliness with true contentment is not satisfied with past attainment. The holiest ambition of the soul is progress. Is your life a factory or a field? Faith, hope and love are the result of cultivation, and that only by actions that give them expression.

Failure begins when a man ceases to surpass himself. When Thorwaldsen had finished a statue that satisfied him, he discovered that his genius, like Samson's strength, had departed. The best in a man ought to grow to the very last. MacLaren was writing a commentary on the Old Testament in the last year of his life, when past eighty. There is no dead-line in the ministry so long as the thought life is being cultivated by personal effort. It is not old age but the loss of efficiency that sends one from scenes of action into retirement.

Absolute goodness is never reached, even if total depravity could be. Yet there is no standstill. It is inevitable that every man tends either toward the one or toward the other. As no man can acquire all knowledge, neither can he become as faultless and as good as Jesus. But if he does not become better, he must become worse. Though he can never learn more than a fraction of the world's knowledge, yet he ought to strive as if he could. Personal effort is the keynote of growth in the realm of goodness. Whenever, from a mountain height, one has once seen a landscape bounded by a distant horizon, he can never again be satisfied with the outlook that can be had from the bottom of a well. Aspiration creates vision and vision in turn creates many aspirations. Aspirations compel actions. Actions are the goal, which the inner moral self strives to reach. The civil war within between good and bad motives must be brought to an end before outer conduct can become ideal.

In a true sense a motive is an action in embryo, and an action is a motive expressed. Bud and blossom point forward to the ripened fruit. The inner activity of the soul leads to outer activity in conduct.

The Thought and the Act

But being, not doing, is what Jesus requires. A good person rather than his good deeds is his primary requirement. Nevertheless, becoming or being is an impossibility apart from doing. There is no character without conduct. Nor can any person become good until his actions are good. The psychologist says we learn by doing. Jesus teaches that men can become good only by doing that which is right.

Thought is well nigh powerless till it is expressed. Temptation is seldom injurious unless it becomes victorious. It is not said that men shall give account for every idle thought, but rather for every idle word. Yet Jesus says a man's motive is his real self, and his action is less accurate as a definition of his character. But a motive usually has a short life, that is denied its expression in an action. Indeed, that motive cannot be a governing one that never becomes an outer action. "Out of the heart are the issues of life." Certainly, motives originate conduct. But actions also create motives. The reflex influence of external conduct on the inner motive life is a greater fact in the daily experiences of men than they are aware of. This is one of the greatest benefits of good habits. As bad conduct makes the heart worse, so good actions make the heart better. The reflex influence of good actions is that they clarify the muddy stream of the heart. Like an eddy, the good actions flow back into the soul. A bad man can begin good actions, because repentance is a fact in men's lives. He cannot continue such actions, however, and remain bad.

Repentance is as much a change of conduct as it is a change of heart. As soon as the inner life begins to change, the outer life also begins to change. The change of either is impossible without the other. Jesus was primarily concerned with the creation of a good person. But good actions are necessary before one can become such a person. A good life, therefore, is the result of good actions. While a good motive is the architect of good conduct, it is conduct alone that gives character its firmness. Habits are not only the result of the groove worn in the brain by the channel of thinking, but especially the result of repeated actions. Indeed, there can be no habits without actions. Habit is not the outcome of thought, but of practice, "pressing toward the mark."

Man's Duty to Act

Paul did not say "this one thing I think—I resolve," but this "one thing I do." Not the idealist merely, but the man of action gains a growth of soul. Actions alone can break the tyranny of bad habits. Thus alone can freedom be gained. "I press toward the mark." Wishing is useless. The greatest weakness is to be content with being as good as one's neighbor. Rather ought one to fight till he is as good as he is capable of becoming. One's neighbor may be a poor criterion for one who would climb. One is disloyal who willingly falls short of his every capacity. Even the good man is bad, if he refuses to try to be a better man. Too often, the good is the enemy of the best. Esau was right in thinking that physical food was good. But he was wrong in acting as if there were nothing better. Some one has well said that if a man is capable of building an empire, he ought not to be satisfied to build a hut.

Many a man has failed to measure up to the talents and prospects of his youth. "The fault is not with our stars, but with ourselves, that we are underlings." The failure is neither with our fates nor with our ideals. Even the man who failed shamefully had ideals enough to have saved him. But he was not a doer. Dreaming can never take the place of action. The physical nerve cries out when in pain. Our environment and companionships are often merciless in their treatment of the finer things of the soul. They may ignore its cry and turn a deaf ear. It then remains for the man himself, the real custodian of his own soul, to turn warrior—to become a doer in behalf of the rights of his own soul. Every man is free to choose his own ideal, but never free to disobey it.

Difficulties need not be millstones about the neck. The man of courage climbs up by them like rounds of a ladder. Intense struggle may mean a fair chance. An iron will can do the impossible and work its way through difficulties. A hard battle is preparation for a harder one. One victory is the forerunner of another struggle. The impossible of to-day becomes the easy task of to-morrow. In no field of endeavor can one long sustain himself by resting on past laurels. The great pianist must practice for hours daily, or else lose what skill he hath. "To him that hath, shall be given." But he who fails to employ his gifts shall suffer decline and loss of capacity. Endurance of character is not gained by one sudden crisis, but rather by the rebuffs of many years. The coral reef is built by a million separate acts.

The Arena for Service

The sacrificial life is the highest form of doing, leading to moral ends. All activity is the expression of stewardship. To acquire means to spend. It may be a greater test to keep money than to earn it. How rightly to acquire and how rightly to use money, education, and Christian experience are problems in the realm of conduct. The man with the one talent failed because he did not act so as to get an increase. Many people do not know how to invest their lives in those activities that will produce usefulness. The human body cannot be kept in health without exercise. Character cannot grow in a vacuum. The ascetic is not the truest type of Christian, because he evades service. Apart from conduct, Christian character is an impossibility. Deny the fish water, and you take its life. Take away from the Christian all unchristian surroundings and social relationships, and you reduce his opportunity to exercise his Christian motives and ideals. The non-use of good motives leads to their decline and extinction. Disuse of the arm tends to atrophy. Old people by bodily exercise have prolonged their lives for years. The Christian heart languishes if acts of service and sacrifice are not required of it. Do not pity the day laborer but the leisure class—the idle rich. With such ever pleasure palls, and life itself is a burden to the idle and aimless. The community is an arena for the exercise of loving deeds and a sacrificial ministry in the behalf of others and their moral well-being. We cannot be moral unless we strive to make others moral. We cannot remain Christian unless we strive to make others Christian also.

I count this thing to be grandly true,
That a noble deed is a step toward God,
Lifting the soul from the common clod
To a purer air and a broader view.
We rise by the things that are under our feet,
By what we have mastered of good or gain,
By the pride deposed and the passion slain
And the vanquished ills that we hourly meet.

Poems Every One Should Know

TO SLEEP

A FLOCK of sheep that leisurely pass by,
One after one; the sound of rain, and bees
Murmuring; the fall of rivers, winds and seas;
Smooth fields, white sheets of water, and pure sky—
I've thought of all by turns, and yet do lie
Sleepless; and soon the small birds' melodies
Must hear, first uttered from my orchard trees;
And the first cuckoo's melancholy cry.
Even thus last night, and two nights more, I lay,
And could not win thee, Sleep, by any stealth:
So do not let me wear to-night away:
Without thee what is all the morning's wealth?
Come, blessed barrier between day and day,
Dear mother of fresh thoughts and joyous health!

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

SLEEP

SLEEP, silence, child, sweet father of soft rest,
Prince whose approach peace to all mortals brings,
Indifferent host to shepherds and to kings,
Sole comforter of minds with grief opprest;
Lo, by thy charming-rod all breathing things
Lie slumbering, with forgetfulness possest,
And yet o'er me to spread thy drowsy wings
Thou sparest, alas! who cannot be thy guest.
Since I am thine, oh, come, but with that face
To inward light which thou art wont to show;
With feignèd solace ease a true-felt woe;
Or if, deaf god, thou do deny that grace,
Come as thou wilt, and what thou wilt bequeath.
I long to kiss the image of my death.

WILLIAM DRUMMOND.

Under the Ban of Rome

ON JULY 1 Bishop M. J. Hoban, of the Scranton diocese, placed a ban on St. Stanislaus Roman Catholic Church, at Nanticoke, and excommunicated several of the members who went to law to force the bishop to give up title to the church property, and thus break an old law of the church. The trouble dated back four years, following the death of Father Gramolowicz, who had been pastor for thirty years. The members wanted to select their own priest, and when the bishop refused the request, they proceeded in court to compel him to give up title to the church, the deed being turned over recently.

The bishop called the action of the congregation a "scandalous attack" on the church. His letter, which was made public to-day, says in part:

"Certain men in defiance of the laws of the Catholic Church brought suit against the bishop of Scranton, and thus incurred excommunication from the Catholic Church of Jesus. I now declare these men cut off from all rights and privileges of Catholics. I now declare that the Church of St. Stanislaus, Nanticoke, is hereby placed under interdict and that no Catholic service of any kind shall be held therein, nor shall any Catholic enter therein without incurring ecclesiastical censure. Forever the cemetery of St. Stanislaus is placed under interdict."

The foregoing extract is from the Philadelphia North American. Just what this Polish congregation did—whether they stood firm or were terrorized into inaction by the ban of the church—does not appear.

TWO GLASSES OF MILK

KEEN-SCENTED reporters are busy night and day in every city and town of this great country hunting out the bitter tragedies and the shocking scandals of life to make big-type stories for the newspapers. We think, sometimes, that the world is more bad than good, and that crime and sorrow are the rule of life rather than the exception. It is not so. The newspapers do not reflect the whole of life.

If as many reporters were detailed to hunt up the records of goodness and joy, they would find countless stories of love and devotion and self-denial. They would find far more goodness and beauty than evil. They would find that many men and women are working and living in quiet usefulness and purity of character to gladden other lives and to exalt and sweeten the life of the nation.

A prominent surgeon was riding one summer day through the country on his bicycle. The road was long and dusty; the afternoon heat was intense. The open gate of a farmstead invited him to turn in. An enticing glimpse of cool, green shade, and of a well sweep, with a shining dipper hanging near, promised rest and refreshment.

A young woman was sitting on the porch, and arose to meet the doctor as he approached, asking permission to help himself to water at the well.

"Certainly," she exclaimed, "but wouldn't you like some milk instead? We have a pitcher of fresh milk on the ice, and I shall be glad if you will have some of that."

"Oh, thank you," replied the doctor, "that would be delightful, but I'm afraid it would impose too much on your kindness. The water will answer as well."

But with a charming grace the young woman insisted upon bringing the pitcher of milk, and the tired doctor drank two glasses of it and was refreshed. When he had rested and was about to go he handed the young woman his card and said, "If you ever come to the city and need the advice of a physician, please call me."

MONTHS passed and the incident was forgotten. About a year later the mother of the household was very ill. The local doctor, who had attended her for many years, could do no more, and informed her that she must go to the city to a hospital for a serious operation. This was sad news for the little family, whose income was slender. The mother protested that such expense was out of the question, but both father and daughter insisted, and planned between themselves for the sacrifices they would make to meet the cost.

Preparations for the trip were hastily completed. The daughter arranged to go and to stay near the hospital at the home of an aunt. While packing her trunk, the card of the bicycle traveler was found, and the young lady decided at once that she would hunt him up as soon as she reached the city, before selecting the hospital. She was somewhat awed as she entered the house of the great surgeon, but he set her at ease in a moment and made her happy by remembering her. She explained all that the country doctor had said about her mother, and asked his advice as to which hospital she should select.

"My dear young lady," said the great-hearted man, as he took her hand, "if you will trust your mother to me I shall be very happy to do all I can for her. I have my own private sanatorium right here and will personally attend to your mother. In the morning I will send a carriage for her and you can come to see her every day. If you have any doubts about the matter just write your doctor and tell him I have the case."

The next day her mother was safely established at the sanatorium, and her daughter was assured that everything possible would be done for her comfort. But in the evening there was panic at her aunt's house.

"My child! What have you done? That man charges the most terrible prices. They say he gets a thousand dollars for one operation, and when he keeps a patient at his own hospital he charges fifty dollars a week for board and nursing. Oh, dear! you should have asked about this before taking your mother there. Your poor father can never pay such charges."

So the frightened girl fled to her room and wept alone in her dismay; but as she remembered the kind face and gentle tones of the great surgeon, she felt that somehow it would come out right.

THE operation was entirely successful, and at length the happy daughter was told that she could take her mother home in two weeks. This would make a total stay of four weeks at the sanatorium, and as she realized what this meant, together with the cost of the operation, which the great man had performed himself, the anxious girl began again to wonder, with fear tugging at her heart, how they would ever be able to pay.

The final day arrived. In the surgeon's private office were the father, mother, and daughter ready to return to their home. The mother was entirely well and looked better and happier than she had been for years. The father and daughter were happy because of the mother's splendid recovery, but the daughter could not shake off her worry on account of the bill which the surgeon would soon give them.

"Now, I am so glad that you are all right again," he said, "and I hope your little visit with me has done you good that will last. I have put your bill in this envelope, which I will ask you not to open until you get home this evening. Then after you have finished supper you can take it out and talk it over."

A little puzzled, but profuse with thanks for giving back health to the beloved mother, the family departed. That evening when the meal was over, the envelope was brought out, and at least one heart beat quickly as the bill was unfolded. Here is the way it read:

To professional service rendered. $.....
To service at Sanatorium. $.....
$.....

Received payment in full, by two glasses of milk given to a weary traveler.

All the main facts of this story are true, and come to me from the Secretary of the Maryland Christian Endeavor Union, Alfred S. Day. It is only one illustration of the beautiful truth that giving pleasure is getting pleasure; doing good is receiving good. "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares."

Do You Know Your Bible?

ANSWERS to List No. 7 of our Bible Questions are still coming in as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press, and the publication of the answers and the honor roll is necessarily postponed till next week's issue. It is important to send answers promptly. One of our students, Willian Tin Soon, is a young Chinese boy living in Honolulu. That is so far from New York that it is almost impossible for him to get his answers to us on time. He is doing fine work, and would have been on the honor roll last month if his letter had reached the office a bit earlier. Eleven of his answers were right. Most of our other Bible students live much nearer than that, and they can get their answers in on time if they will work fast and mail their letters promptly.

Here are the new questions:

LIST NO. 8

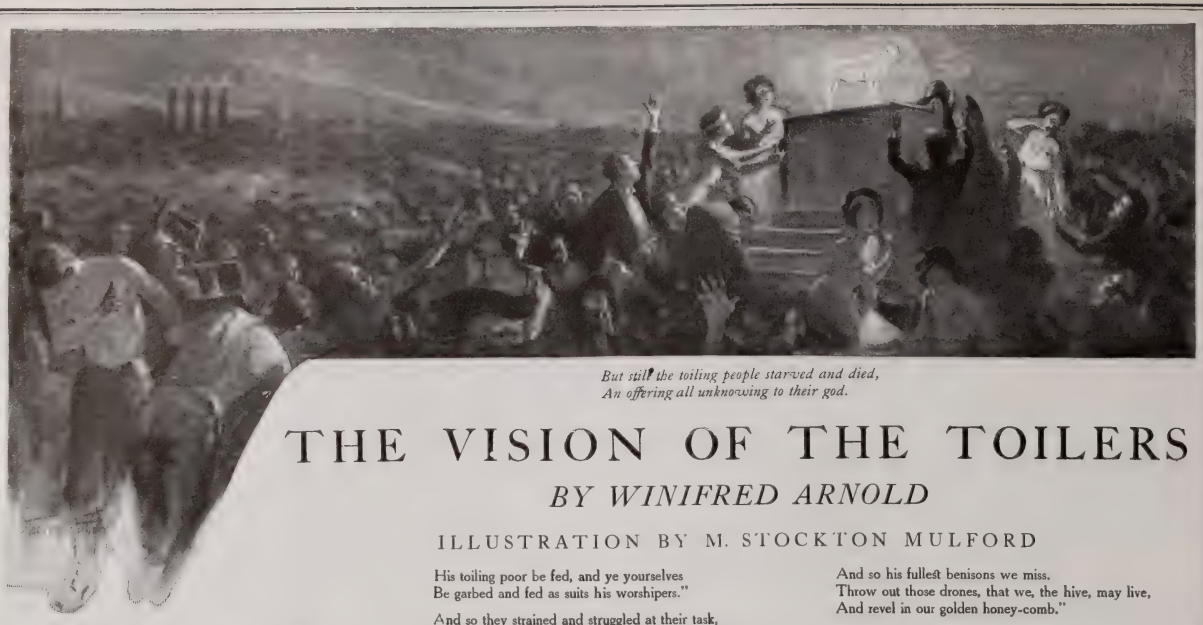
1. On what occasion did four men sit upon the ground seven days and seven nights?
2. What king was allowed to choose one of three punishments for his transgression?
3. What is the first Bible reference to a hypocrite?
4. What prophet was suspended between earth and heaven by his hair?
5. What births recorded in the Scriptures were announced by angels?
6. In what passage does an Old Testament prophet mention by name three men of eminent piety, and who were they?
7. What member of the early church tried the patience of the Beloved Disciple by his ambition for leadership?
8. To persons meeting what conditions did Jesus declare that he would manifest himself?
9. What does the New Testament say of a man who says he loves God yet hates his brother?
10. Where should the Christian's eyes be directed while he is running his race?
11. What argument does Paul present in a passage in Romans to show that we may ask large things from God?
12. By what two things does a passage in Revelation declare that Christians overcome the devil?

New York Anti-Graft Crusade

A GREAT mass meeting of citizens of all classes was held in Cooper Union, New York, on August 14, at which resolutions were adopted demanding that the police alliance with criminals shall cease, that vice shall be dealt with by the strong arm of the law and that the reign of "graft" and blackmail—the price of police protection paid by the gamblers, the "white slavers," and the gangs of professional criminals—must come to an end. Speeches were made by District Attorney Whitman and several others, including Mr. Emery R. Buckner, the brilliant young lawyer who is to conduct the graft investigation. It was a gathering which, in numbers, spirit and enthusiasm, recalled the famous meetings when the people of the metropolis rose in their power and overthrew the notorious Tweed Ring. A Citizens' Committee was appointed to co-operate with the district attorney in bringing the guilty to justice—not only the murderers of Rosenthal, the gambler, but every person who is shown to be connected with the gigantic system of police protection for the criminal classes.

The search for Rosenthal's assassins continues, two of them being still at large. Another of the suspects, Sam Schepps, has been arrested at Hot Springs, Ark. He is said to have been one of the go-betweens and to have received and paid over the "blood money" given by Webber at the order of Lieutenant Becker, to enable the murderers to get away from New York. Jack Sullivan, the intimate friend of Becker, who is now in the West Side Prison, New York, is said to have joined Rose, Webber and Vallon in making a clean breast of his connection with the graft collections.

It is said the evidence has been found proving that $250,000 of graft was deposited in New York City banks by men connected with the police and that at least one important official is implicated.



But still the toiling people starved and died,
An offering all unknowing to their god.

THE VISION OF THE TOILERS

BY WINIFRED ARNOLD

ILLUSTRATION BY M. STOCKTON MULFORD

THE people gathered in the market-place,
Where sat their golden god, Prosperity,
And said: "The time has come when all must toil
To offer fitting tribute at his feet,
To gild his altars and make fat his priests,
To deck ourselves as suits his worshipers,
To feed the poor who flock from foreign shores
That they may glean in his rich harvest fields.
So all must labor; strive with hand or brain.
No longer can we let those dreamers go
To distant mountain-tops among the clouds,
To worship their strange gods, and to return
With visions that they thrust before our eyes
Of splendid far-off cities they have seen
With walls all grounded deep on Truth and Right,
And towers shining in Love's fadeless day."

AND so they dragged their dreamers from their dreams,
And chained them to the treadmill with the rest,
And blinded eyes that search for mountain-tops,
And said: "Ye idle ones, turn now and work,
That our great golden god may bless us still.
His altars must be heaped, his praises sung,
His toiling poor be fed, and ye yourselves
Be garbed and fed as suits his worshipers."

And so they strained and struggled at their task,
Those dreamers, lashed to round of humdrum toil,
And slaved and sweat to make their offerings meet,
Like blinded Samson with his strength all gone.

So still the altars shone, and still uprose
The loud-voiced pæans in the despot's praise;
But still the toiling people starved and died,
An offering all unknowing to their god.

Then spake their leaders: "Some are shirkers still,
Some are not striving with their hearts' full strength.
It is these dreamers here. Pile on more chains,
And lay the lash upon their bared backs,
Till from their souls they worship and adore."

BUT still the people perished, though, bowed down,
The dreamers strained and tugged with heartstrings taut,
And pyres burned high for man and little child,
While women in their shameful woman's plight
Were offered to the god of gold and lust.

Then cried the people: "Throw those idlers out;
Too long we've suffered them to burden us.
They are no honest worshipers of his,
Our splendid, mighty, golden-throned god,
And so his fullest benisons we miss.
Throw out those drones, that we, the hive, may live,
And revel in our golden honey-comb."

So roughly then they tore the cords away,
And roughly they unwrapped their dazzled eyes,
And lashed them forth with taunt and threat, to starve.

But, once outside that cursed market-place,
The dreamers seemed to gather strength, and soon,
As if with manna fed, they struggled on
With eyes still smarting, but with hearts grown strong.
And feet that bled, but climbed the narrow way
Up to the misty mountain-tops where rise
Those altars to that God still all "Unknown."
Then, worshiping, they turned their longing eyes
To where, still distant, but still fair and true,
The vision gleamed—the City of their God.

THEN back to all their members rushed the strength
Of Deity itself, and with his love
All brimming in their hearts, they turned and ran Back to the market-place, to bring new life
To those who perish there without that sight,
And starve for heavenly food, and know it not.
Back to the market-place with outstretched hands,
Filled full of living Bread.
Oh, will the people eat?

MONT-LAWN AS OTHERS SEE IT

WHAT the readers of this journal think of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, near Nyack-on-the-Hudson, is already well known from the many hundreds of letters that have been received from subscribers who have visited "The Children's Paradise." But there are many others who, though not united by the same sympathetic bond of interest as the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family Circle, have come into personal contact with the work at Mont-Lawn and have expressed their warm admiration and approval of what they saw there.

Editor George B. Helmle of the Nyack Journal, in a recent issue of his paper, gives this description of a visit he paid to our Children's Home:

"Little do the people of Nyack, or, for that matter, of any other town, fully realize just what a place THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Home for Children is, or what it does for thousands of the poor of the great city. If the joy, the health, the sunshine and the lasting impression upon the minds and hearts of these hundreds of youngsters could but find adequate and full expression in one grand outburst, the power of it all would fairly shake the earth and awaken mankind to the fact that there is really something worth while, and worth supporting, going on at Mont-Lawn.

"A few days ago quite a number of friends were invited by Miss E. Goering, the matron, to spend the greater part of a day up there. It happened to be Saturday, the day of unusual interest and activity among the little tots of the great tenement districts of the big city, many of whom, at this place, get their first real glimpse of dear old mother earth and the wonders which God has wrought upon it. And what an awakening! The velvety grass, the grand old trees, the flowers, the birds, the sunshine, the invigorating air, the majestic Hudson, the pretty cottages, the beautiful Temple, the great graceful flag, cannot help but stir the emotions and fill one's soul with the conviction that God is good and that man ought to be more like him.

"Every ten days, through the summer season, some three hundred little folks are thus received, entertained and impressed at this institution. Over all these reigns a little woman, full of pent-up enthusiasm and firm determination. For two years she has been matron of the Home, and never before in its history has the general management gone along so well and so smoothly. With Dr. Sandison, president, and Henry Colver, treasurer of the Home, together with Otto Koenig, president and treasurer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Publishing Company, Matron Goering works in harmony.

"Any housekeeper can well realize what it means to provide suitable and healthy food and entertainment for three hundred or more youngsters hardly old enough to be away from their mother's apron strings. And they have good food, too, meat at least once a day, while some three hundred quarts of milk and some two hundred loaves of bread are consumed daily by the empty little stomachs, always crying out, as did Oliver Twist of old, 'more, more.'

"In the morning the children are taken on short walks, and the teachers give them nature talks. Kindergarten instruction fills in the afternoon, while the smaller children delight to play in sand pits, especially prepared. On rainy days, and they are not many, the hurdy-gurdy is put at work and indoor amusements are afforded; thus the children are continually amused and instructed. Time and space will not permit a detailed description of the clean and pretty dormitories; the new bath-house with shower baths, and a swimming pool which is soon to be added; the self-consuming and sanitary sewage system; Fort Plenty, the open air dining-hall, where, when all are in their places, at a tap of the bell, they sing, in unison, that quaint old grace:

> "God is great and God is good,
> And we thank him for our food;
> By his hand must all be fed.
> Give us, Lord, our daily bread. AMEN.

"But the songs and the singing of these youngsters! That is the wonder and the delight of the visitors, for some, indeed, are moved to tears, as the three hundred or more take their seats in the beautiful Temple, and with prayer and song and talks and blessing, this small army of joy-hearted boys and girls, of every creed and nationality, sing the touching songs of faith and patriotism.

"The wonder of it all is the rapidity with which these children learn, not only the words, but the music of the songs, and they sing with a fervor that is surprising. This, no doubt, they imbibe from their leader, Professor Noll, whose enthusiasm, rigid yet kindly teaching and patience bring about such surprising and satisfactory results. 'Mont-Lawn Bells,' 'It Never Pays to be Bad,' and the 'Glory Song' are the favorites, and when the children get onto the swing of these songs the Temple fairly rings, and what is especially pleasing is the two-part songs, and visitors are so delighted that they can hardly refrain from applauding. It is certainly fine! Saturday and Sunday afternoons are the best times to visit this Children's Paradise, and visitors are always welcome."

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Lieutenant Colonel John H. Compton, in command of four troops, is stationed at Fort Sullivan among the foothills of the Big Horn Mountains. The country is in a state of feverish unrest, as the Sioux and Cheyenne Indians are on the war-path, and many settlers have been massacred. Colonel Compton's wife, Mary, and their little four-year-old daughter, Ethel Benton, are with him at the fort. There are several other women, wives of officers, and Mrs. Compton's pretty Irish maid, Molly McNeil, who dearly loves the little girl. Molly is very popular with the soldiers, but gives her preference to Private Danny Meagher of Troop B. One day an alarm is given, the officer of the guard reports Indians on the hills to the westward, and the troops are ordered to get ready. In the meantime little Ethel has wandered from the enclosure, the Indians see her, and the chief swoops down on horseback and carries her off. With frantic haste the soldiers pursue the marauders, but the colonel knows his men are outclassed in numbers and there are still women to protect in the fort, so he causes the recall to be sounded. An investigation is held as to how the child got out of the grounds. Private Meagher comes forward and confesses 'twas his fault in not guarding the gate, but Molly McNeil takes the blame on herself, saying she tempted "the bhoy." The Indians put up a flag of truce, and Colonel Compton and his officers meet three of their leaders. These propose to give up the child in return for the fort. The proposition is haughtily rejected, and death is threatened to the little one. Private Meagher is put under arrest and is to be courtmartialed, when he asks to speak with the colonel.

CHAPTER IV

PRIVATE MEAGHER DESERTS TO THE ENEMY

In a few moments Meagher, attended by a corporal's guard, was marched into the colonel's room. His guard released him and stepped back; the colonel motioned them to remain in the room.

"Well?" he said sternly.

Meagher moistened his lips and tried to speak, but could make no sound.

"Speak out," said the colonel; "what do you want?"

"If the colonel pleases," Meagher at last gasped out, "I—" He found difficulty in continuing.

"You have not come to beg for mercy, have you?"

"No," returned the private, a little color coming to his face. "I acknowledge me fault, sor, an' 'tis all mine. You won't do anything to Molly, sor?"

"What can I do? She is a woman and—"

"It was me that tempted her, sor. I clean forgot meself an'—"

"There is no justification in that."

"I know it, sor, I know what I've done an' what I deserve. I know what the court martial will award me. I've got nothing to say agin' the justice of it. I'm ready to take me punishment like a man. I failed in me duty, sor, but the colonel knows I'm no coward, an' Captain Calmore knows it too, sor."

"Yes," said Calmore, thus appealed to, "I know it."

"You didn't come here to tell us that, I take it," said the colonel, "and—"

"I am coming to it, sor. Next to Molly," said Private Danny, "I loved that baby of yours, an' before I'm punished for me fault, I'd like to git her away from the red devils yonder if she's alive."

"Yes, we'd all like to do that," said Dexter coldly.

"Well, sor, I want to try it, if the colonel pleases."

"Try it!" exclaimed the colonel. "Are you mad?"

"Oh, listen to him," interposed Mrs. Compton, who had heard in silence all that had transpired.

"Have you a plan?"

"I have, sor."

"What is it?"

"'Tis to escape this night an' pretend to Dull Knife an' his men that I'm a desarter, an' by that means to git into their camp an' then to take a chance at stealing away with the young missy."

"Ninety-nine chances to a hundred you'd get shot before you could have speech with Dull Knife."

"Yes, no doubt, sor, but I'd be glad to take the wan chance for the sake of the child, if the colonel would let me. The court will probably condemn me to death anyway," pleaded Meagher, "an' why not let me thry before I die? Besides, sor, if I were kilt that way, it would save the record of the regiment, which has never had a case like mine before."

The door from the dining-room was thrown suddenly open. Molly burst into the room and threw herself at the colonel's feet.

"For the love of heaven," she cried, "don't let him do it."

"And would you rather have him shot as a criminal by his comrades than take that kind of a chance?" said the colonel coldly. He had not much sympathy for Molly after her folly.

"I don't want him shot at all, at all, for I love him," Molly cried.

"Molly, is it the truth you are saying?" cried Meagher.

"It is," returned the woman. "I treated you shamefully; 'tis my fault."

One of the soldiers found a little girl's shoe

"Indeed, 'tis not," protested Danny Meagher earnestly. "Does the colonel belave me? I'm as good as a dead man; I wouldn't lie to him now."

"I don't believe you would," Compton admitted.

"An' I swear I don't want to pretend to desart to save me life. I want to save the child, an' I give the colonel an' the other officers present me word of honor that I'll come back if I live whether I save the child or not an' surrender meself a prisoner for trial. 'Tis only the word of a private, sor."

"The honor of a private soldier of the American army should be as dear to him as that of any officer," returned Compton.

"And it is, sor, thank your honor for them words," exclaimed Meagher.

"Oh, Danny, Danny," wailed the woman, "don't go."

"'Tis only the colonel's permission I am waitin' for, Molly, darlin'," returned the man.

"What do you think, Dexter?" asked Compton.

"I don't think there is a chance in the world, but as far as I am concerned, I'd rather have him shot by the Indians than do it ourselves, and it would in a way save the regimental record if he could escape."

"I agree with Captain Dexter," said Calmore in answer to an interrogative look from the colonel. "I believe that Meagher means what he says, and there is a bare chance that he can bring it off. I am in favor of letting him escape."

"Let him go," whispered Mrs. Compton, although no one had asked her opinion, which nevertheless had more weight than any other with her husband.

"I'll bring that baby back to you, ma'am, or I'll die the death of a desarter, if the colonel will only let me go," said Meagher.

The colonel was sunk into a brown study.

"Meagher," he said at last, "I am inclined to accede to your request."

"Heaven bless you, sor," answered Meagher, his face lighting.

"You give me your word of honor that, successful or not, you will surrender for trial again when the opportunity arises?"

"My word of honor, sor, so help me God," said Meagher, with great solemnity.

"I take it," answered Compton briefly. "Now as to the details."

"The moon will be up in an hour, sor," returned Meagher. "I have thought it all out. I can git over the wall of the corral, slink along the stockade till I reach the meadow an' then make a dash for it. The men on guard will fire at me, the more of them the merrier, an' if I could git hit an' slightly wounded so as not to knock me out, it would be better. It would make them believe then that I was honest."

Molly lay on the floor moaning.

"My dear," said the colonel sharply, "if that woman doesn't stop, I will have her taken out. Very well, Meagher, it shall be as you say. Corporal, you have heard all that has passed?"

"Yes, sir," answered the corporal of the guard, saluting.

"And you, too, men?"

"Yes, sir."

"Take the prisoner away, and send for Mr. Dalton and Sergeant Brace."

"Thank you, sor, an' God bless you," cried Meagher, "I'll do me best to show meself a man an' to bring you back the baby."

"Corporal," said the colonel, "just let the prisoner step into the dining-room alone a moment. No, he won't run away now."

It was quite evident what the colonel gave the soldier that permission for, and Molly, struggling to her feet, followed after him and closed the door behind her. The colonel's wife looked at him gratefully because of his kindness.

"Mr. Dalton," said the colonel as the officer of the guard, accompanied by Sergeant Brace, entered the room. "I have decided to allow the prisoner, Meagher, to escape. He intends to desert to the Indians in the hope that he may be received by them and find an opportunity to steal away my little daughter."

"Very good, sir," returned Dalton.

"You are to let him go over the wall near the stockade; he is to slink along the stockade until he gets to the meadow and then make a dash for it; the guard is to discover it and open fire upon him until he gets out of range; care must be taken, however, not to hit him, also you must not overdo the firing. Let it be just what would occur if a prisoner were escaping; understand?"

"Yes, sir."

"Brace, you, too, comprehend?"

"Yes, sir."

"Very well; we must have no hitch about it; it seems to be our only chance."

"I will attend to it, sir."

"Very good; you can go."

The colonel himself stepped to the door of the dining-room and called Meagher. The soldier tore himself away from the clasp of Molly's arms, and,

Where Are You Known?

SOMETHING was in the papers not long ago about the postmaster of a great American city. The city was so large and important that its postmaster is something of a national character. The thought perhaps occurred to more than one mind that it is odd to discover how unfamiliar the name of a man holding so important a position may be outside his own State. One often thinks this about even the governors of the various States. They hold offices of high rank and authority; they are national figures. Yet if the present voters of America were challenged to name all, or half, the governors of the forty-eight States before they could vote, it is likely that not many ballots would be cast.

Often the situation is reversed. People who are little known or not highly regarded near home are famous in the outside world. Many a poet or artist or scholar is lightly esteemed in his own community, but is admired and loved by multitudes elsewhere.

As there are many other States and countries than the one in which a citizen may be well known, so there are other realms than this, realms of the heavenly kingdom. And it may be that people well known in this world are scarcely known at all in the greater territories above, while many who are well known there are unknown here.

Jesus said to his disciples, "Your names are written in heaven." It is a tremendous thing to have our names written in the records of heaven. But is anything else there besides our names? "There is joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth." Do you not think the people that bring in the new names are well known in heaven? Every time a name is added a record is doubtless made of the name of the one who brought in the newcomer to the fold.

Then there are people faithful in other forms of work: people who are peculiarly patient, people who know how to bear disappointments and distresses with cheerfulness; people who are on the lookout for some one to help or comfort. There are people noted in heaven for the prayers they make. Matters are stirred throughout the spiritual world when these folks go to their knees.

Multitudes of aged Christians who have been somewhat forgotten in the present rush of church work are far from forgotten in heaven. Dear old men and women who live quietly and modestly, out of the modern currents, perhaps, and fearing they are of not much account, are of vastly greater service than they dream. Perhaps the prayers they make in their old-fashioned homes are doing more to bring down the power of God and keep heaven's blessing upon church and community than the vigorous labor of the stalwart younger folk.

It will be pleasant if we can find, some day, that we are well known in heaven. We should not work for that end; if one should start out with that motive, to win heavenly fame, he would fail of it, just as those who set out to win earthly fame usually fail of that. But to lose oneself in affectionate service for Christ; to be alert in doing his will; to be faithful and fervent and triumphant in prayer; to be mighty in faith; to be sweet and patient in trouble; to be eagerly winning new souls for the heavenly citizenship; to be losing our life that others may find life; to be forgetting self in zeal for Christ and in tender care and earnest work for others—to be living that sort of life is to be getting fame in heaven.

Where Science Fails

MANY readers of this journal will doubtless recall the case of Dr. Charles Augustus Briggs, the distinguished theologian, whose trial in 1892-93 for the dissemination of certain radical views concerning the authority of the Scriptures, was a famous case in those days. In a recent issue of the American Journal of Theology, Dr. Briggs tells something of his subsequent investigations in the study of Christology. He says:

> In late years, I have sought to find in the most recent results of scientific and philosophical investigation something that would help in the study of the most difficult theological questions, anything that would enable me to test, verify, or correct the Christological opinions I had inherited from my teachers; and I venture to affirm that I have found very little help. And I challenge any man to produce any valid results of modern philosophy or modern science that will in the slightest degree impair the Christ of the church as represented in her creeds and institutions. It is significant that the modern objectors to the Christ of the church content themselves with challenging the definitions that the church has already made. They revive ancient heresies, nothing more. These speculators, many of them, call themselves Modernists. They tell us they have a new theology. They may be Modernists in the philosophical and scientific spheres, and may have new speculations, some true and some false; but so far as theology is concerned, and the Christ of the church, they have nothing new or modern.

In all his experiences, as Dr. Briggs' article implies, he has never been away from Christ. He found that science failed completely to shake the basis recognized by the theologians as applying to the great central Figure of the Christian faith. It is a fine thing when great minds begin to perceive such limitations—to understand clearly that, after all, the natural cannot compass the spiritual, and that the methods and apparatus of the ablest scientist are but poor tools with which to measure infinity. And when a man, having skirted the wilderness, comes back to the good and stable ground of simple faith, he finds it a land of realization, where the humblest believer may know those sacred and blessed truths which science and philosophy are quite incapable of demonstrating.

The Papacy in Politics

MANY and vehement have been the denials of the Catholic press of the charge that the Roman Church has ever attempted or contemplates attempting active interference in American politics. These disclaimers were scattered to the winds when a direct order was received from Rome by the Convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union at Notre Dame, Ind., on August 8, the facts concerning which are set forth in the following press dispatch which appeared in the New York Times on August 9:

> A sensation was caused to-day at the convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union, now in progress at Notre Dame, Ind., when the president of the Union, the Rev. Peter O'Callaghan of Chicago, announced that he had received a communication from the Pope commanding that the members of the Union have no connection with the Prohibition Party.

This is interpreted officially, of course, as meaning that it is the wish of the Pope that the members be left free to work in any party they may desire; but the rigid discrimination against the Prohibition Party is evident, and as there is no other temperance organization with a national ticket in the field, the order can only be construed as having one object, viz.: to drive the Catholic temperance vote over to the candidate favored by the Church. Why is it not perfectly logical to conclude that, having now claimed the right to forbid the support of one political party, the Pope will presently claim the right to command the support of another political party? It is added that the Pope's wishes meet with the approval of practically all the ecclesiastics in attendance at the convention.

In 1886, Leo XIII. gave this command:

> We exhort all Catholics to devote attention to public affairs, and take part in all municipal affairs and elections and all public services, meetings and gatherings. All Catholics must make themselves felt as active elements in daily political life in countries where they live. All Catholics should exert their power to cause the constitution of States to be modeled on principles of the true church.

The order conveyed to the Catholic Total Abstinence Convention, however absurd it may appear on the surface, is an instance of actual papal interference in American politics which can hardly be misinterpreted. It is a part of the great campaign "to make America Catholic," under which the promotion of the church's welfare is superior to all other considerations. It also reminds us that a loyal son of the Roman Church is "a Catholic first and a citizen afterward." How the Prohibition leaders regard this order we do not know, but we presume they at least will accept it as convincing proof of the pernicious activity of the Church of Rome in our national politics.

Our Heathen at Home

MISSIONARIES who have returned on furlough from their posts in foreign lands express surprise at the progress Orientalism has made here within the last few years. Places of Vedanta worship, conducted by so-called swamis, are spreading here with amazing rapidity. Los Angeles, Pittsburg, Washington, Boston, St. Louis, Denver, San Francisco, Chicago and Lowell have now swamis or other leaders of occultism, and it is asserted that over thirty thousand persons, mostly women, attend the services and follow the strange pagan doctrines. In round numbers, the deluded American followers of these teachers of heathenism are said to reach one hundred thousand. This is probably an exaggerated estimate; yet it is a matter for wonder that any movement of this character should be able to make such headway in a land which is doing so much to convert the heathen abroad to the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Vedantism claims to be a universal religion. It has been called the core of Hinduism. It is an ancient, pantheistic philosophy, subtle and indefinite, yet alluring to many minds through its mysticism and its teaching of successive incarnations. When one hears that there are fifteen thousand Americans allied with the Mazdagna sun-worship propaganda alone, and that this particular cult has its temples here in which ancient rites, suited to the necromancy of medieval times, are performed, one is naturally incredulous. Surely here is a field for missionary work right at home. To conceive of Americans worshiping Krishna, who had 16,000 wives and 180,000 sons during his incarnation, and "Kali the Terrible," whose history is probably the most repulsive of that of any heathen deity, demands such a stretch of imagination that the average person will refuse to believe in its possibility.

It is time for a counter movement by the churches of our land to check the influence of this strange and unnatural development, and to give to the misguided devotees the real truth about the pagan beliefs into which they have been beguiled by the skilful swamis, who are making a rich harvest, especially from susceptible women.

General Notes

—MULAI HAFID, Sultan of Morocco, has abdicated in favor of his brother, Mulai Youssef. The change of ruler was a peaceful one. The ex-Sultan has gone to France, taking with him his entire harem and a large number of attendants.

—JACOB SCHURMAN, of Ithaca, N. Y., president of Cornell University, has been appointed United States minister to Greece. He is fifty-eight years of age and has had a brilliant career. He went to Cornell in 1886 as Sage Professor of Philosophy, and was elected president of that institution in 1892.

—NEW YORK IS TO HAVE another gigantic skyscraper, which is to be the largest office building in the world. It will rise on the site of the present Equitable building and $14,000,000 is said to have been the price paid for the land alone. It will occupy a whole city block from Broadway through to Nassau Street, and will have thirty-six stories. The sale of the land is the largest single transaction of the kind in the city's history

Leconte, Haitian President, Killed

THE National Palace was blown up in Port-au-Prince August 8 and General Cincinnatus Leconte, president of the republic of Haiti, was killed. With him perished his ughter and son-in-law, who was the Minister of iblic Works. Among the burned and blasted ins the president's body was found on the bed on ich it had slept, burned to a crisp. Having won s office by the sword, Leconte determined to have rce ready at hand, and had stowed his palace llar with vast quantities of munitions of war. A e in the palace set these explosives off, and scores, not hundreds, of persons were killed or injured, d houses for a mile around were damaged. It is t known certainly whether the explosion was an cident or the result of a plot of his enemies. It more than likely that his enemies did it, for a ajority of the presidents of that republic in the st hundred years have been urdered while in office, and ost of the rest have been sent to exile. Only the smallest mber, less than a half dozen, ve ever been allowed to live t their presidential terms. In 01 Toussaint l'Ouverture broke e power of France in Haiti, d a few years later a republic as established, which has con-nued with almost no interrup-on as the form of government l now. Stormy as it has been, e Haitian republic is one of e oldest democracies in the rld. Leconte was the twenty-cond native ruler of the re-blic. He was a mulatto be-een forty-five and fifty years age, and previous to entering aitian politics he practiced w. Million for Memorial Library

N ARCHITECT in Philadelphia has just an-nounced that Mr. P. A. B. Widener will erect a llion dollar library building for Harvard Uni-rsity as a memorial to his grandson, Harry kins Widener, who lost his life when the Titanic nk. Harry Elkins Widener in his will left his lendid library of three thousand volumes of books Harvard University under the condition that the iversity provide a suitable building to house the me. The grandfather conceived the idea of pro-ding that building himself immediately on the ath of his grandson, but did not reveal the sur-ise till now. The building will be known as the arry Elkins Widener Memorial Library, and will of brick and marble to conform with the style of e university buildings at Cambridge. It will be ree stories high, 275 feet long, and 210 feet wide. e room will be set apart to hold the collection of arry Elkins Widener, which is now being cata-logued by the librarian of Harvard. How sweet and strong the affection of grandparents for the grandchildren, and that of the grandchildren for the grandparents. This mutual devotion is one of the loveliest compensations of age. How beautiful to perpetuate this affection in the library building at Harvard, for the love and not the marble is the memorial. Christ forever marks the immortality of earthly love.

Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her. (Matt. 26: 13.)

Planting Trees for Ties

THE scarcity of timber for railroad ties has become so great, and the price charged for them is so high, that the Pennsylvania System has adopted a scheme of raising trees for its own use. More than four and a half million of trees have been planted by this company in the past ten years. Last year alone 515,703 trees were transferred from the company's nursery at Morrisville, Pa., to permanent places on railroad property. The present stock at the nursery, which includes thirty-six acres of ground, is 2,296,833, of which 2,072,166 are forest trees, and 224,667 ornamental plants. Steel has largely taken the place of trees for building material, and in some places for railroad ties, but the destruction of the forests of this country has been cruel and wicked, and the national health and wealth will be promoted by the replanting of trees. Early in the history of the world we read of a man planting a grove of forest trees.

And Abraham planted a grove in Beersheba. (Gen. 21: 33.)

Tag Identifies Lost Child

AS POLICEMAN COMOLLI was passing the corner of Fifth Avenue and One Hundred and Tenth Street, New York City, a little girl about three years old walked up to him, and placing her hand in his said: "I am losted." The bluecoat was on his way to the station-house, and so he took the child with him. On her way to the station and while there the little thing kept reaching down the inside of her dress at the neck, and the officer thought she was reaching for a mosquito bite, but the lieutenant discovered that she was trying to get at a metal tag hung around her neck by a string. On the tag was printed the child's name and address. A patrolman went to the address and found the parents, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Ketner, and brought them to the station to identify the child. It seems that the child had gotten into a habit of running away from home, and the tag had been put on to identify her. It is as natural for a child as it is for a sheep to wander away from home. There is required the strongest parental love to counteract the influence. Three years of age is rather early to develop this straying instinct, and the tag saved the little thing from what might have been dangerous consequences. This incident suggests the identification mark of his faithful children by Christ:

And I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, and I will write upon him my new name. (Rev. 3: 12.)

The New Postal Bill

THE new post office bill to be passed by Congress contains features that are of great significance. The Mann amendment will practically close every post office in the first and second class cities of the country on Sunday and give the large and loyal force of employees a day of rest. The special delivery mail will be excepted from the rule and will be delivered on Sundays as now. The law will be a moral victory scarcely to be calculated, and the universal church ought to rejoice. Three years ago a modest letter-carrier of New York City, Mr. E. A. Eggers, began the agitation of one day of rest in the week for the post office employees throughout the nation. It was the privilege of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to commend his plans and ask the public to co-operate with him in them, and though he seemed to be asking for impossible things, those hopes, plans, and Christian prayers are to be embodied in a Federal law with nation-wide and eternity-long consequences. Our own beloved America, the modern Israel, should, like the one of old, remember that all the tender providence of God should prompt an obedience to the divine commandments:

Therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day. (Deut. 5: 15.)

Fortune for Fake Picture

ARTISTIC Paris had a veritable sensation recently when Baron Henri de Rothschild, who bought the famous La Tour pastel portrait of Duval de l'Epinay at the Doucet sale for $132,000, refused to take the picture on the ground that it is "not authentic." The Baron employed experts to examine the portrait. These experts have declared the picture unauthentic, and he refuses either to pay for or accept it. Baron Henri is very angry at the imposition practiced, and it is more than likely that, amicable adjustment failing, the question will be left to settlement in the courts, which may take several years of contest. It seems such an impertinence to push fraud into the realm of the beautiful, into fine art. But into what sacred precinct will avarice not enter and what sin and crime will it not commit to satisfy its cravings. Some millionaires get money out of the plain people by fraud, and some plain people get money from the rich through falsehood and forgery. The attempt to get an ordinary fortune as the price of a "fake" picture is an illustration of the myriad methods devised to get the property of another without rendering an equivalent. These deceits from penny pilferings to the taking of a railroad or bank, from the polite and loquacious liar in a transaction to the housebreaker and highway robber, all break the commandment:

Thou shalt not steal. (Ex. 20: 15.)

THE HEART, THE HOME, THE NATION*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

HE WAS moved with compassion for them because they were as sheep not having a shepherd." For more than a year Jesus had been gathering "disciples." The word means learners, and should never be confused with "apostles," which means those sent out. There were only twelve apostles, who were selected out of hundreds of disciples in the second year of Christ's ministry. The two words disciples and apostles represent the two great words of Christianity, Come and Go; Come to Jesus, Go and teach. We are privileged to come to Jesus and become "disciples" if we desire to learn the truth. Whatever may be the proper tests for ministers and church officers, there ought to be at least a vestibule in every church where all sincere learners, all true disciples, however small their faith, however large their doubts, can be enrolled and shepherded. The relation of the sheep and the Shepherd, in Old Testament and New, pictures the relation of new disciples to the Good Shepherd, who is Leader, Provider, Healer, Defender. The opening verses of this lesson picture him as gathering the lost sheep of the House of Israel, by "teaching, preaching, healing." Note that "teaching" has the place of honor.

The Universal Call to Service

"Then saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plenteous. Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that he send forth laborers into his harvest." When disciples have learned the first principles of religion, which are forgiveness through Christ and the new inner life of the Spirit, then the disciple is called from the sheepfold to the harvest field of service. All through the Bible members of the church are pictured as sowers and reapers whose devotion to God must be shown by helping their fellow men. Church members are no longer "few," but "laborers" are still "few."

In Christianity spontaneous service is the consummate fruit of a tree whose root is love, whose trunk is law, whose sap is spiritual life. If service be lacking it is a barren tree. "He gave some to be apostles and some prophets and some evangelists and some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints unto the work of ministering" (Eph. 4: 11, 12). Note that in this full census of the church we do not find in the list "some idlers." When Adoniram Judson returned to the United States from his missionary work in Burma, at the close of a great address to a multitude that gathered to give him welcome, a woman wrung his hand with exuberant joy and said, "Mr. Judson, I would like to be a returned missionary." There are many such who would like the joys and honors of service without the toil and sacrifice. Every Christian is called to be a missionary—a foreign missionary, a home missionary, a city missionary, serving all these fields by regular and generous contributions of money, and serving also in person in a near, if not remote, harvest field.

That word "service" is one of profound significance. It is from the same root as "servant." It recalls the great teaching of Jesus, "he that would be greatest of all, let him be servant of all." And that teaching has become the test of honor in all civilized lands. The selfish man gets temporary honor by wealth or political success, but it is those who have been "servants of all" whose names are in history's hall of fame—the martyrs, prophets, saviors.

Ways of Doing Good

"Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out demons." The fundamental fact we should seize here is that those who are sent out to work for God must do something besides talk. Religion must not exhaust itself in masses and meetings. "Speaking in meeting," when it is sincere testimony for Christ, is twice blest; it blesses those who speak and those who hear; but it must not become perfunctory, and it must not be considered the whole of religion or even the chief part of it. Saying, doing and being, these are great, greater, greatest, in Christian life. That was a good compliment: "He lives as loud as he shouts."

It is a very narrow interpretation of the Bible to suppose that we must do the very same work in the twentieth Christian century that the apostles were told to do in the first century. There were few educated physicians and nurses then, and no hospitals or sanitary boards. These are now fully developed in Christian lands, largely through the influence of Christ and his apostles, and the church can therefore leave to medical science mostly the work of healing. Even in Paul's day miraculous healing was rare and work on the individual and social conscience took the leading place.

All Christians are not to have the same work, but every Christian must do some work. And rank does not depend in God's sight on the kind of work, but the spirit in which it is done. Even the apostles differed greatly in rank. Only two or three were great preachers, only three or four were writers of Bible books. None of them were learned. But all were useful save the betrayer, who lacked not talent but consecration.

Christianity Blesses the Home

"And as ye enter into the house, salute it." Jesus taught that the coming of Christianity to a home would be of such value to it that the apostles had a right to expect free entertainment as a partial return. Much as Christianity does for the individual Christian, it shows a richer fruitage in a true Christian home. The very word "home" is a Christian word and comes from the Puritans. The Roman word familia meant hardly more than a tribal encampment. The only person in it with any "rights" was the Roman man. Wife, children, slaves, cattle, were all his property. That was the best that the highest mental culture in a pagan civilization could do for the family relation. To learn what Christianity has done for the family look into a Christian home in any truly Christian land, where children are loved and servants respected, and all join in family worship, in which all petty quarrels are buried before they have hardened into grudges. Christianity fills every home where it is welcomed with pure marital and parental love, living flowers of beauty and fragrance. Even the homes in Christian lands that do not welcome the Christ are blessed by the influence of his teachings through ages past and should receive him in gratitude and for protection against discord and divorce that seldom blight a Christian home.

Christianity and the Social Conscience

"It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom than for that city." Here we are reminded that Christianity brings civic blessings to cities and lands, and that Sodom, to which the message of Christ did not come, will be more excusable in the day of judgment than more respectable Capernaum, because the latter heard but did not heed his call to civic righteousness. In order to realize how Christianity has revolutionized every aspect of government, changing despotism to democracy, torture of prisoners to "reformatories," oppression of the poor and weak to laws for their defense, we need to turn to pagan lands of to-day and see this transformation in progress.

One of Dr. John G. Paton's stories will help to show the governmental and social influence of Christianity. A New Hebrides young chief named Youwili was bitterly opposed to the Gospel, and gave the missionaries much trouble. Observing that for several days no natives came to the mission house, inquiries were made of an old chief as to the reason. "Youwili has tabooed the paths and threatens death to any one who breaks through it." The taboo was an obstruction made of reeds stuck in the ground somewhat like a fence. "Then," was the reply, "I conclude that you all agree with him and wish us to leave. We are here only to teach you and your people. If he has power to prevent that, we shall leave." The old chief, Youwili's father, at once called the people together and explained matters to them. They then sought out the white man and said: "Our anger is strong against Youwili. Go with us and break down the taboo. We will assist and protect you." This was done and all present agreed to punish any one who dared to replace the obstruction. A few days later Youwili appeared before the mission house, axe in hand, and proceeded to cut down some bananas—a declaration of war, meaning that he was prepared to cut down the missionary. The old chief and his men were near at hand, ready to prevent any disaster. Dr. Paton called out: "This must not continue. Are you going to permit him to defy us all and break up the Lord's work on Aniwa? If you cannot righteously punish him, I will shut myself up in my house and withdraw from all attempts to teach and help you till a vessel comes, and then I can leave the island." "No, no," cried the people, "you must not leave us." "Very well, you know the resolution. It is for you now to decide. Either you must control that foolish young man, or we must go!" Much speechmaking followed. The people resolved to seize and punish Youwili; but he fled and hid himself in the bush. Once more the old chief approached Dr. Paton and said: "It is left to you to say what shall be Youwili's punishment." "Shall we kill him?" "Certainly not! Only for murder can life be lawfully taken away." "What then? shall we burn his houses and destroy his plantations?" "No." "Shall we bind him and beat him?" "No." "Shall we place him in a canoe, thrust him out to sea, and let him drown or escape as he may?" "No, by no means." "These are our ways of punishing. What other punishment remains that Youwili cares for?" "Make him, with his own hands and alone, put up a new fence and restore all that he has destroyed, and make him promise publicly that he will cease all evil conduct toward us. That will satisfy me." This idea of punishment seemed to amuse them greatly. They laughed and cheered and said, "It is good! It is good! Obey the word of the Missi" (the native name for the preacher). After considerable hunting the young chief was found and brought before an assembly of chiefs who scolded him severely and told him their sentence. He listened with surprise and replied: "To-morrow I will fully repair the fence. Never again will I oppose the Missi. His word is good." By daybreak Youwili commenced repairs, and before evening he had everything made right, better than it was before. When his task was over, he left without uttering a single word. The work of the missionary then started anew, and earnest prayer was offered for the conversion of the young chief. Apparently there was no result. But one day as Dr. Paton, assisted by two boys, was dragging a hand-cart full of coral blocks, Youwili came upon the scene and said, "Missi, this is too hard for you. Let me be your helper." That was the first step. His countenance became brighter and more peaceful, and in a few days his wife came with a message, "Youwili sent me. His opposition to worship is over now. I am to attend church and school. He is coming, too. He wants to learn how to be strong, like you, for Jehovah and for Jesus." Youwili proved to be slow at learning to read, but he had perseverance, and his wife greatly helped him. The two attended the communicants' class together, and ultimately both sat down at the Lord's Table. Thus does Christianity transform bad citizens into good citizens everywhere it goes.

I think the immortal servants of mankind
That from their graves watch how by slow degrees
The world-soul greatens with the centuries,
Mourn most man's barren levity of mind;
The ear to no grave harmonies inclined,
The witless thirst for false wit's worthless lees,
The laugh mistimed in tragic presences,
The eye to all majestic meanings blind.
O prophets, martyrs, saviors, ye were great,
All truth being great to you; ye deemed man more
Than a dull jest, God's ennui to amuse;
The world for you held purport; life ye wore
Proudly, as kings their solemn robes of state,
And humbly, as the mightiest monarchs use.

THE PATIENCE OF THE OLD

THE patience of the old—a blest completeness
That crowns the tide of years when ebbing mild and low!
Unto life's latter days it gives a noiseless sweetness,
Like slippered feet that travel soft and slow.
For all the ties of life that bind them here
Have weaker grown from fleeting year to year;
The hearing gone, the eyesight dim,
And trembling seen in hand and limb!

The patience of the old—'tis thus I reason:
Their grinding work in life is almost, almost done;
Their constant toil sustained through ev'ry changing season,
Their burdens borne in blinding rain and sun;
And then there comes the gentle, healing calm
Of viet'ries nobly won, a precious balm,
That soothes the chastened, ling'ring soul
While life's remaining moments roll!

The patience of the old—ah, blessed token!
A life serene, at peace, it tells to me and you;
Of harvests gathered in, life's duties high unbroken,
And then the waiting for the last adieu.
God's peace is like a river deep, 'tis said,
And they submerged from foot to silver head;
The soul made all in sweet accord,
This is the spirit of the Lord!

The patience of the old—methinks the singing,
The angel voices of the loved ones gone before,
Borne on the misty tide of years they now hear ringing,
And note above life's furnace blast and roar;
Entranced they sweetly listen as they stand,
As to a message from the golden strand;
These blessed accents of the past,
They hear above the raging blast!

The patience of the old—oh, grant it, heaven,
When earthly scenes grow dim my fading sight before,
To me may this contentment, e'en to me! be given,
And may it go with me unto the farther shore;
Then down the jeweled aisles I'll walk enraptured,
My new-found senses blest, my new heart captured,
And see at last, no cloud between,
All wondrous patience and all love serene!

Meagher, of course, was not hit, and a short time was out of the range.
e kept on running, however, while "Good heavens!" exclaimed Comp-n, "who could have fired that shot?

ur last hope is gone."

The three officers stood gloomily tching. They saw, or thought they d at least, a figure hauled from the ound and laid across one of the rses, after which the Indians turned ck to the hills. They were just rning to descend the tower when a an broke out of the woods and hailed

"Don't shoot," cried a voice they all cognized. "It's Marnett."

The colonel in an instant plunged et the old scout.

"Wall, colonel," said Marnett cheerlly, "I plugged that deserter all ght."

"Oh, Marnett," said Compton avely, "I am afraid you have spoiled r only chance."

"How's that?" asked the scout ickly as he entered the post.

"That was Meagher. It was all a heme between us; he was to pretend y baby."

"Is that Miss Mary's baby I seed ith the Indians?"

"Yes," answered the colonel.

"Goodness! I'm sorry I drawed a quick gitaway."

"They sent me a letter written by me half-breed offering to exchange the baby for the post, and saying they would kill her if I didn't accede to their demand."

"It's jest a bluff, colonel," said Marnett. "Now, with your permission (I had to turn my pony loose in the woods yonder), after I git a little rest an' somethin' to eat an' drink, I'm goin' to git some young soldier here to go with me an' git away south an' east until I strike a telegraph station an' git help for you, unless you've got a better plan, for they're goin' to attack you in the morning."

"Let me go with him, sir," asked Hadden.

"Well, Mr. Hadden," said Marnett shrewdly, sizing up the young officer, with whom he had some acquaintance, "if the colonel says so, I'd about as soon have you for trailmate an' fightin' mate as anybody in this yere post."

"Thank you, Marnett," said Hadden.

"Take Hadden if you wish," said Compton, "although he is one of my best officers and I can hardly spare him."

"We'll be back before the fightin' is over," said Marnett.

"And now if you will go over to my quarters you will find something to eat there," added Compton.

"And I want to say a word to hearten up Miss Mary," answered the old scout.

CHAPTER V

The Regiment Marches Away

MARNETT and Hadden got away safely that night. As Marnett had anticipated, the Indians attacked the post early the next morning. Short of an escalade they tried every possible way to capture it, even managing to set fire to it, but their efforts availed them nothing. The soldiers easily drove them back, killing many of them. In truth, they had not a chance on earth to succeed with the tactics they employed, and as water and provision abounded in the stockade, the garrison suffered no special hardship.

The fact of the baby's loss, however, preyed on the whole garrison. There never was a body of soldiers who longed more earnestly to go out in the open and grapple with their red besiegers than they. The Indians wanted that, too, for their overwhelming numbers, their knowledge of the rough, broken, mountainous country, so well suited for ambush and surprise, so easily defensible, would have given them an easy victory over so small a force. They could cut it to pieces. Therefore to entice the troops away from the post was what the Indians most particularly desired; they would have made short work of the soldiers if they could have got them in the open, for the Indians were better armed and practically as well mounted as the troopers. The Winchester repeating rifle with which the braves were all armed was a more serviceable weapon than the cavalry carbine. The cavalry horse was no better for service purposes in that country than the Indian pony, and the Cheyennes possessed a large number of remounts, which the soldiers did not have.

Furthermore, the hills would have afforded abundant cover for the Indians, and the small force of soldiers would have been caught in the defiles and exterminated. Dull Knife was one of Crazy Horse's best lieutenants, and in many a campaign had shown his strategy and tactics. He was a worthy antagonist on that score for the very best commanders in the army.

The Indians had not yet killed the baby, and they continued to irritate the soldiers by displaying her just out of range, where she could easily be seen by the garrison. Sometimes they struck her, or appeared otherwise to ill-treat her. Those were the hardest things to bear.

Although they tried to prevent it, Mrs. Compton saw these evidences of savage barbarity, for they could not keep the wretched, heart-broken mother away from the tower. Her feelings can better be imagined than described, and yet she got a certain satisfaction from the evidence that the child was still alive.

After four days of this desultory siege, Marnett crept into the fort one night and brought the welcome news that Colonel Huntley, from the nearest post to the east, was coming up with a battalion of infantry and two troops of cavalry. The foot soldiers had been loaded into wagons, and they were coming almost as fast as the horsemen.

Marnett transmitted to Colonel Compton a plan of attack formed by Colonel Huntley, by which it was arranged that the garrison of the fort should make a demonstration in force, on a given signal, by a sortie, while he fell on the rear of the Indians. But the Indians were better served than the soldiers by their scouting parties, and when Colonel Huntley's force arrived in the vicinity of the post early the next morning they had broken camp and moved away to the northwest through the mountain passes.

The siege was thus raised, and with the departure of the Cheyennes the peril to that country was over. Riding over the place where the Indians had camped, one of the soldiers found a little girl's shoe, which he brought back to Mrs. Compton. This seemed almost like a souvenir of one who had passed to another world, for it was the only evidence of the child's presence that was discovered. In all these days nothing had been seen of Danny Meagher. The Indians had carried off the bodies of those who had been killed in the skirmishing. It was thought they might have scalped and left the remains of the soldier, but there was no sign of him anywhere. The colonel took some comfort in this. He believed that Meagher might be alive and possibly able to effect something, but Marnett privately held a contrary view; he had drawn a bead on the soldier, the shot had been easy, and he was not accustomed to missing his aim. He did not say anything about this, however. It would have been cruel to take away the only hope of the parents.

The newspaper men had accompanied Colonel Huntley, and they, of course, soon learned the story of the baby, which was promptly spread broadcast over the United States. Public opinion was greatly aroused thereby, and Colonel Compton's heroic resolution in sacrificing his child to his duty as a soldier met with instant commendation. And the commanding officer of the Fourteenth having opportunely received the much coveted star of a brigadier general, Compton found himself, while still a young man, left in command of the regiment, the new colonel being kept on staff duty, to the approval of every one.

Public opinion did more than approve; it clamored for a winter campaign against Dull Knife, for the annihilation of his band, which had been guilty of other most atrocious cruelties and maraudings. It had been the policy of the War Department hitherto to confine its expeditions to the open seasons, especially in the mountainous countries, and to place the troops in forts and cantonments during the winter. A different policy was to be followed now, and Colonel Compton's earnest request to take the field, backed as it was by an overwhelming public demand so soon as it was learned that his whole regiment was assembled at Fort Sullivan equipped for a winter campaign, was promptly granted. Again he was given an independent command, although he was the youngest lieutenant colonel in the army, with orders to go where he would and to do what he might to run down Dull Knife, to find his child, rescue her if she were alive and avenge her if she had been killed, by breaking up and bringing in the band.

It was a sad yet glorious day at Fort Sullivan when the regiment, assembled for the first time in its history, ten troops fifty strong, marched away. It was a bright winter morning in December when they paraded for the last time in the meadow.

They broke ranks for a few brief and hurried moments of farewell, all too short, before the final assembly was sounded.

Poor Mary Compton clung to her gallant husband without a thought for the others, as the rest of the women did with those whom they loved.

"I will find her, darling," said the colonel reassuringly, "if she is on the face of the earth. Somewhere in those mountains Dull Knife is hidden for the winter. We will comb them until we find him."

"And you will be careful, dearest," whispered his wife; "careful of yourself; you know I have only you now."

"Careful of my men, perhaps," said Compton, smiling at her, "but in expeditions of this kind, you know, the commander must lead."

"You will watch over him, Mr. Marnett, won't you?" pleaded the wife, turning to the old hunter who was to accompany the expedition as chief of scouts, and who was never very far away from the colonel's side.

"It's like askin' me to look after a lightnin' flash," answered the old man, smiling kindly at her, for he loved her very much and for a long time, "an' nobody but God can really look after Colonel Compton; but I'll do my best, ma'am, an' I got a hunch that we're goin' to bring the little gal."

"If the colonel pleases, sor," said Molly, who was Mrs. Compton's constant and faithful attendant, "will you please, sor, thry to find out what is become of poor Danny Meagher? And if he is alive, will you tell him I am pinin' away for a sight of him?"

"That I will, Molly," said the colonel, looking kindly into her pale face, whence the roses had all departed. He had long since forgiven poor Molly.

"Now, Mary, we can't stay any longer."

He kissed his wife's cold cheek before them all on that snow-covered meadow; then he turned to his orderly, mounted his horse, nodded to the bugler, and the clear notes of the assembly call rang over the little plain. He drew his sword when the regiment was formed, spoke a sharp word of command when the cheering died away, and then all took up the march.

The band, which was to stay behind with the two companies of infantry that had been detailed to garrison the post until the Fourteenth came back, played merrily the famous battle air of the regiment. The women and children, wrapped in furs, stood in the meadow looking long after the column, which trotted across the clearing and disappeared among the snow-covered foothills, headed for the great range, somewhere in the heart of which lurked the great and redoubtable chief with his cruel warriors like a group of savage lions in their lair.

IMPORTANT EVENTS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—A READER IN PORTLAND, ORE., Mr. D. L. Kichle, writes us that the recent school election in that city was not for superintendent, but for a member of the board. Rev. Edwin V. O'Hara, a prominent Catholic priest of Portland, has written to Mr. Kichle that the priests at the church in question were not responsible for the distribution of cards at the church door. He adds that they did, however, speak of the necessity of citizens performing their duties at the polls, but mentioned no names of candidates.

—YIELDING TO THE storm of disapproval coming from many sources at home and abroad, the conference committee on the Panama Canal Bill agreed, on August 13, to recommend that only coastwise ships be admitted to the canal free of toll, while the required tolls must be paid by all American-owned ships engaged in foreign trade. Among other points agreed upon by the conference were: American registry of foreign-built ships; prohibition of railroads from operating water routes which compete with their own railway lines; denial of the use of the canal to any vessel owned by a trust if that trust is doing business in violation of the Sherman Act.

—A DESPATCH FROM Odessa gives a startling story of a conspiracy of Russian sailors on several warships to abduct the Czar, and compel his abdication, or the proclamation of a limited monarchy. The plan was to seize the imperial yacht Standart, with the royal family on board, while en route from Yalta to Sevastopol. The crews of several warships, at a given signal, were to mutiny, murder their officers and attack Kronstadt and St. Petersburg simultaneously. One battleship, the Ivan Zlatoust, was the center of the conspiracy, and sixteen seamen and petty officers were arrested, four of whom were shot and ten others sentenced to death.

—JULIUS ROSENWALD, a Hebrew business man of Chicago, on August 11, his fiftieth birthday, gave away $687,000 to various charitable and educational institutions. Jewish and Christian bodies are included in the seven institutions specified by Mr. Rosenwald as beneficiaries of his gift, while $25,000 goes to Dr. Booker T. Washington for negro education. The University of Chicago, for the erection of a woman's gymnasium and buildings for geological, geographical, and classical departments, receives $250,000; Associated Jewish Charities of Chicago, $250,000; Chicago Hebrew Institute, for a gymnasium, $50,000; a Country Club for Social Workers, $50,000; Home for Jewish Orphans, $25,000; Tuberculosis Sanitarium, $25,000, and a Manual Training School, $12,500.

—THERE SEEMS TO BE somewhat of uneasiness in Turkey at the present time. The wheels of the machinery so vigorously oiled by the Young Turks when they deposed Abdul Hamid are not running as smoothly as was anticipated. In fact, there is friction and possibly the brakes may have to be applied ere long. It is hinted that the Committee of Union and Progress, which seeks to set up a rival parliament to the new government, may even utilize the dethroned Sultan for their purpose; it is said some of them are as anxious to get him back as they were eager to send him away. Many Turks of the old as opposed to the young school look upon Abdul still as the rightful ruler in conformity with a sacred Moslem law which stipulates there can be only one Sultan and that his successor cannot be chosen until death causes a vacancy. These, uniting with the discontented element among the party of the Young Turks, may bring about a change in the near future. The war with Italy is another issue that is intensifying the situation and tending to bring matters to a crisis. The Young Turks are anxious for peace, but Italy is showing no intention of backing out of the campaign in Tripoli, believing that she will be able to break up the Mussulman occupation of that country. Again, the Turkish atrocities occurring here and there are causing a bitter feeling between the two parties, the one approving and the other condemning.

—TURKEY, IN THE REGION of the Dardanelles, experienced a serious earthquake on August 9, resulting in a loss of several hundred lives, with thousands of people rendered homeless and property destroyed for a radius of many miles. The important Turkish seaport of Gallipoli, situated where the Dardanelles joins the Sea of Marmora, and the key to the commanding position of the strait, was almost wholly destroyed. In the town of Shar-Koy, which was completely wiped out, 60 of the inhabitants were killed and 150 injured. At Ganos-Hova 80 persons were killed and 30 wounded. Here the wrecked buildings caught fire and were burned to the ground. Tchanak-Kalessi, on the narrowest part of the Dardanelles, suffered severely. The place to suffer most was Myriophito. Here the loss of life and havoc to property was very distressing. It is believed fully three hundred were killed instantly and twice the number wounded. Oil from lamps used to illuminate ikons communicated flames from house to house until the whole place became a charred ruin. All the district between Adrianople and Constantinople felt the shock in more or less degree. Forty miles southeast of the former city, beside the river at Lule-Burges, the earth was split into fissures, some of them a mile long, which belched forth sand, foam and sulphurous gases. The hospitals at Constantinople are filled with victims of the catastrophe. Appeals are being made for outside aid and the Turkish Government is doing its best to relieve the suffering.

THE GOSPEL IN THE HIMALAYAS

Traveling on Coolie-Back

ROM his distant station away on the edge of "the of of the world" illiam Greet enoses the two pictures produced on this ge. Of the first he ys: "This picture ows how our boy avels through the eeps and gorges with s." Describing the cond picture, Mr. reet writes: "This tle house where we e is on a ridge diding the unevangeled region of mounins and valleys north rough Tehri, from e plains away south. ractically from the nce seen in the picre there is no Christianity right ay to Russia." We quote some the most interesting incidents om Mr. Greet's open letter from the hri Border Village Mission, Lanur, Himalayas: "One of the saddest ings we have ever witnessed was our or old Thammu in his heathen surundings, as he had to face his last ys. We call him ours because he as the first to welcome us into the lley where he lived. He was a poor l blacksmith and jeweler (this is ite a natural combination of handafts here), and his veranda was distant villages and shout to him their attempted greetings, condolences, or exhortations not to be afraid, but he knows he is going. They prepare for his departure by hauling him up for a ceremonial bath in the sun outside, and this rouses him so that he sits up and utters a few words: 'I—am—going and — it — is — dark very — dark.' His friends around are chattering on every subject and in the midst of it I try to make him hear what the Bible says about the Light of the City and who may enter. He lives through that day, so the next day they repeat the barbarous bathing, this time in another corner of the room, and though till yesterday he had not been able, they say, to take nourishment in any form for many days, they now repeat what was included in yesterday's ceremonies, giving him boiled rice for the journey, while I am powerless to interfere. Between their urgings as to its necessity and his own old way of thinking, he forces himself to take some spoonfuls, and that of course hastens on his death. After a few hours he dies.

The Border Fence of Christianity

all places the most readily offered shelter for us among people whose ste, in spite of their dirtiness, genally forbids our entrance to their uses.

"Thammu has said less than some hers as to his judgment of the mesge, but he showed at times some real xiety to know 'the Way,' and he d not quote other names as he did at of Isa Masih. Of social customs knew none but those of his own eople, and these are terribly corrupt. ast year he sent for us in a time of vere illness and said he wanted bapsm, but those of his household held m back. And now, in his death-sickess, with the first and the last of his ven wives trying to care for him, he ars to die. He rouses himself from s half conscious state on hearing my ice, declares he is Christ's and asks he told more about him. On the rength of this request I push my way ast more than usual of Hindu cereonials that are going on, his relatives oking very doubtful as to whether ey shall let me, as an old friend, step ast their cooking place to sit with im in his corner. It is filthy and ark and stuffy, but has never been olluted by the step or touch of a forgner and a Christian.

"The old man is again only half conious, but fresh relatives arrive from

"We have shouted into the valley of death the condition of life, amid the clamor of men and all evil powers, and now nothing remains in this house but the right and power of his people to put rice and colored powder on his forehead and carry his body away to burn it on the Jumna's banks.

"From Maugi we moved one stage farther than we had hitherto taken our camp, and there we spent a fortnight where the villages lie closer to each other than in any part of our field. The people received us very gladly, though it was mostly as kind sahibs who give medicine. There are certain places, up and down the country, which the people use as regular stage resting-places when traveling to and fro, and at them it is sometimes good to spend some days. Our camp at the village of Gorakuri was such a place, and there I had long talks and readings with people from great distances. One party came from the Rawai country beyond the Jumna source. They were burly looking fellows, these northern men, but simple as children about everything told them. They bought a couple of copies of the Gospel. My pockets are stained with the red earth of wheat taken as the price of the copies. This earth-dust is used to preserve the grain from insects."

HAPPY COZY CORNER DAYS

WATCH FOR THE COZY CORNER MASCOT

Can you guess her name? It begins with a D. She is expressing it as well as a little girl can. The little girl's picture will appear in four different attitudes. If you guess the name, which is quite a common one, you can have a prize which I will tell you about next week.

IS THIS THE MAN FOR ME, I WONDER?

MY DEAR GIRLS:

Among the heaps of letters here on my desk in the busy offices of the dear CHRISTIAN HERALD from boys and girls everywhere, there is a packet which I have labeled "Dilemmas," and which I want to answer here and now. In every letter some dear Cozy Corner girl has just turned a new leaf in her little book of life and is beginning to read there the exquisite chapter, old as the world, new as the day just dawned—the story of first love—and she writes for counsel, God bless her.

It never grows old, that story; its life is youth itself. I am glad you have come to it, glad you have told me about it, and perhaps I can give you the advice which you so sweetly ask.

Let me assure you first of one thing: you are not alone in your transport. Those who love you and are near you have probably guessed, so do not necessarily seek to hide your new awakening from them. The coming and going of your friend all in the new light of love drives you to blushes and sets the hot blood coursing through your veins at a higher rate of speed than you have ever been conscious of before. Do you think no one has noticed it? Some intense admiration of his personal appearance makes you dreamy and conscious of his presence even when he is not there. Should he pass by the window or fail to pass by is the all-important question of your day, no matter how slyly you may have concealed it, and do you think, dears, that the household is so dull as not to have made account of it? Above all, you are certain that no one understands you. Ah, the secret is out now. No girl at the first sweet dawn of love ever believes she is understood, and perhaps right here your dilemma lies.

Listen. This time of awakening, with its self-consciousness, its blushes, its uncertainties, its ecstasies, its impatience and despondency, comes to all normal girls. You are no exception to a general rule as old as love itself. Rest assured of this and trust yourself to speak frankly to some one in whose sincerity you believe and whose guidance you would value.

You may be reasonably sure that your parents have seen the questioning love-light in your eyes and are making allowances for your shy, uncertain ways and the hours spent in idle dreaming. You may be sure, too, that they are anxious to play their part in your first little love drama, with wise counsel and gentle service.

To be sure, sorry blunders are sometimes made by over-loving, over-cautious parents: "We want you by us always. We love you, oh so dearly. We need you at home," are dear and familiar arguments which loving fathers and mothers have used at such times from time immemorial. Too often, perhaps, their judgment comes swiftly and uncompromisingly, and because she is a dear, loving, hopeful daughter full of loyalty and self-sacrifice, it comes about easily that Polly or Marjorie or demure Janie, in a panic of loyalty, instantly decides that Jack or James or Charley or Robert can never be anything to her, and by that quick decision sets a little ache in her unselfish heart that will last all the rest of her life, maybe.

On the other hand, some over-zealous person in whom a girl might easily confide, paints the characteristics of her boy friend in such glowing terms that the little doubter quickly sweeps away all hesitancy and decides, poor little dear, that she has found her soul-mate, only to be bitterly disillusioned in the hard-to-break fetters of a promise when it is too late.

Teens and Twenties

NOW, my sweet girl questioners and sweethearts all: My counsel to you is just this: Confide freely and frankly in your father or your mother, your older sister, perhaps, or better still, your big, manly brother; listen faithfully and weigh carefully what they say. Heed both the good and the uncomplimentary that they will lovingly tell you about your friend. Keep it deep within your own questioning heart and turn it over and over. Ask God to help you measure up justly and fairly the gold against the dross. But even then, perhaps, the old question, "Is he the one for me, I wonder?" still rings in your mind unsettled. And now is the time to come frankly and painstakingly to your own self and ask—not the commonplace, foolish queries, "Can I love him?" "Could I marry him?" "Shall I tell him Yes?" "Shall I tell him No?" but put yourself to the greater test, and in the night alone, when all is quiet and your prayers are said, ask yourself, "Could I live without him?" "Could I endure the coming days unfilled with his love, his guidance, his cheerfulness, his care for me?" "Can I face life with its problems, its joys, its sorrows, its comforts, if he is not with me?" Listen faithfully to your own heart's answer, and I assure you, according to its whisperings you will know whether this is the right man for you or not, because you will have ceased to wonder.

Lovingly and faithfully yours,

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner

HANSEL

When Humperdinck set the matchless story of Hansel and Gretel to music for his own children, the German parents rose up en masse and demanded that all German children be allowed to hear their beloved story told by music. Our Hansel is almost one's ideal of the thoughtful child in the woods who comforted Gretel when they were left alone in the deep forest.

POPPY FIELD

The reproduction here gives no idea of the wonderful qualities in this picture. There is no red so royal and gorgeous as a "poppy" red. The coloring throughout the painting is sumptuous yet surprisingly harmonious, combining the deep green of the fields, the brilliant red of the flowers and the luminous blue of the sky.

A CANAL IN HOLLAND

A glimpse of Holland reproduced in all the rich coloring for which the Low Countries are noted. Every year art students from all over the world go to the Netherlands to catch the splendid color combinations abounding in the towns and landscapes. The picture also gives an excellent idea of how the streets formed by both water and land make highways and waterways through the towns.

SIX BEAUTIFUL PICTURES
IN COLOR, EACH 10 x 14 INCHES

DO YOU want these six splendid pictures in full color? Of course you do. We have just made several thousand sets for free distribution among our subscribers who will favor us with just a few minutes of their time. We want the names of all the Christian people in your community, so that we can send them sample copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and thus introduce ourselves to people who are not now subscribers. We ask for only fifteen names for these beautiful pictures because we want carefully selected names—names of people whom you know are not now subscribers and names of people whom you have every reason to believe should be interested in such a paper as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In our last name offer, two years ago, we gave only one picture for twenty-five names. This present offer of Six Pictures for fifteen names is the most liberal offer of this kind that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has ever made. All we ask of you is to send 10c to pay postage and handling of the pictures. We ask you nothing whatever for the pictures themselves. Similar pictures sell in art stores today for as much as $1.00 per copy.

These small half-tone illustrations can give you only a very inadequate idea of the splendid reproductions of these beautiful paintings. They are printed in full color on plate paper, ten by fourteen inches in size. All of these pictures have been used as covers for The Christian Herald. Many requests have been received for copies for framing. Of course these specially printed copies on plate paper make a still finer and better appearance than that shown on the covers of The Christian Herald. These full-color reproductions are without lettering of any kind, except the title and the artist's name. The six pictures will be mailed, postpaid, in a strong tube so as to insure safe delivery.

A SUMMER DAY

One of the most attractive of the pictures we offer. The scene gives a vivid idea of a hot June day in the country. By the shadows under the trees, one can see that it is nearly noon. The quiet peace of the country stretching away to the distant mountains suggests a "Sunday stillness"—and this, with the contentment of the children, is wonderfully restful.

MME. MOLE-RAYMOND

This portrait of Madame Mole-Raymond is easily the favorite among the many portraits painted by Madame Vigee Lebrun. One famous critic said of the original painting, which for many years hung in the Louvre, "There is almost enough action and witchery in that girl to carry her right out of the canvas."

ART WINS THE HEART

The coloring of this delightful subject is exquisitely rich and beautiful. The Greek decorator at his work and the absorbed maiden watcher have not only the appeal of their beauty, but the added fascination that all the world feels in watching the craftsman at his handiwork. Then, too, there's just the suggestion of a story. Just the same old story that has made all ages one.

THE WAY OUT

Change of Food Brought Success and Happiness

An ambitious but delicate girl, after failing to go through school on account of nervousness and hysteria, found in Grape-Nuts the only thing that seemed to build her up and furnish her the peace of health.

"From infancy," she says, "I have not been strong. Being ambitious to learn at any cost I finally got to the High School, but soon had to abandon my studies on account of nervous prostration and hysteria.

"My food did not agree with me, I grew thin and despondent. I could not enjoy the simplest social affair for I suffered constantly from nervousness in spite of all sorts of medicines.

"This wretched condition continued until I was twenty-five, when I became interested in the letters of those who had cases like mine and who were getting well by eating Grape-Nuts.

"I had little faith but procured a box and after the first dish I experienced a peculiar satisfied feeling that I had never gained from any ordinary food. I slept and rested better that night and in a few days began to grow stronger.

"I had a new feeling of peace and restfulness. In a few weeks, to my great joy, the headaches and nervousness left me and life became bright and hopeful. I resumed my studies and later taught ten months with ease—of course using Grape-Nuts every day. It is now four years since I began to use Grape-Nuts, I am the mistress of a happy home, and the old weakness has never returned." Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

THROUGH THE SOUL'S WINDOWS

BY DR. O. S. MARDEN

Books are the windows through which the soul looks out.—H. W. Beecher.

TUMBLING around in a library," was the phrase Oliver Wendell Holmes used in describing in part his felicities in boyhood. One of the most important things that wise students get out of their schooldays is a familiarity with books in various departments of learning. The ability to pick out from a library what is needed in life is of the greatest practical value. It is like a man selecting his tools for intellectual expansion and social service. "Men in every department of practical life," says President Hadley of Yale, "men in commerce, in transportation, or in manufactures, have told me that what they really wanted from our colleges was men who have this selective power of using books efficiently. The beginnings of this kind of knowledge are best learned in any home fairly well furnished with books."

Dr. O. S. Marden

Libraries are no longer a luxury, but a necessity. A home without books and periodicals and newspapers is like a house without windows. Children learn to read by being in the midst of books; they unconsciously absorb knowledge by handling them. No family can now afford to be without good reading.

It is related that Henry Clay's mother furnished him with books by her own earnings at the washtub.

Children who are well supplied with dictionaries, encyclopedias, histories, works of reference, and other useful books, will educate themselves unconsciously and almost without expense, and will learn many things of their own accord in moments which would otherwise be wasted; and which, if learned in schools, academies, or colleges, would cost ten times as much as the expense of the books would be. Besides, homes are brightened and made attractive by good books, and children stay in such pleasant homes; while those whose education has been neglected are anxious to get away from home, and drift off and fall into all manner of snares and dangers.

IT IS a great thing for children to be brought up in the atmosphere of books. It is astonishing how much a bright child will absorb from good books, if allowed to use them constantly, to handle them, to be familiar with their bindings and titles.

Wear threadbare clothes and patched shoes if necessary, but do not pinch or economize on books. If you cannot give your children an academic education you can place within their reach a few good books which will lift them above their surroundings into respectability and honor.

Is not one's early home the place where he should get his principal training for life? It is here we form habits which shape our careers, and which cling to us as long as we live. It is here that regular, persistent mental training fixes the life ever after.

I know of pitiable cases where ambitious boys and girls have longed to improve themselves, and yet were prevented from doing so by the pernicious habits prevailing in the home, where everybody else spent the evenings talking and joking, with no effort at self-improvement, no thought of higher ideals, no impulse to read anything better than a cheap, exciting story. The aspiring members of the family were teased and laughed at until they got discouraged and gave up the struggle.

If the younger ones do not want to read or study themselves, they will not let anybody else so inclined do so. Children are naturally mischievous, and like to tease. They are selfish, too, and cannot understand why any one else should want to go off by himself to read or study when they want him to play.

Were the self-improvement habit once well established in a home, it would become a delight. The young people would look forward to the study hour with as much anticipation as to playing.

I KNOW a New England family in which all the children and the father and mother, by mutual consent, set aside a portion of each evening for study or some form of self-culture. After dinner they give themselves completely to recreation. They have a regular romp and play, and all the fun possible for an hour. Then when the time comes for study, the entire house becomes so still that you could hear a pin drop. Every one is in his place reading, writing, studying, or engaged in some form of mental work. No one is allowed to speak or disturb any one else. If any member of the family is indisposed, or for any reason does not feel like working, he must at least keep quiet and not disturb the others—an ideal condition for study. Everything that would scatter the efforts or cause the mind to wander, all interruptions that would break the continuity of thought, are carefully guarded against. More is gained in one hour of uninterrupted study than in two or three broken by interruptions.

Were it possible for every family that squanders precious time to spend an evening in such a home, it would be an inspiration. A bright, alert, intelligent, harmonious atmosphere so pervades a self-improving home that one feels insensibly uplifted and stimulated to better things.

SOMETIMES the habits of a home are revolutionized by the influence of one resolute youth who declares himself, taking a stand and announcing that, as for himself, he does not propose to be a failure, that he is going to take no chances as to his future. The moment he does this he stands out in strong contrast with the great mass of young people who are throwing away their opportunities and have not grit and stamina enough to do anything worth while.

The very reputation of always trying to improve yourself in every possible way, of being dead in earnest, will attract the attention of everybody who knows you, and you will get many a recommendation for promotion which never comes to those who make no special effort to climb.

There is a great deal of time wasted even in the busiest lives, which, if properly organized, might be used to advantage.

What would a business man accomplish if he did not attend to important matters until he had time that was not needed for anything else? The good business man goes to his office in the morning and plunges right into the important work of the day. He knows perfectly well that if he attends to all the outside matters, all the details and little things that come up, sees everybody that wants to see him, and answers all the questions people want to ask, it will be time to close his office before he gets to his main business.

Most of us manage somehow to find time for the things we love. If one is hungry for knowledge, if one yearns for self-improvement, if one has a taste for reading, he will make the opportunity.

Where the heart is, there is the treasure. Where the ambition is, there is always time.

When you wish to buy a book worth while, do you know where to get it, or how much it will cost you, or what its size, binding or appearance will be? If you want good books but have to think twice about these things let us tell you about

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY

It comprises about 600 volumes of the World's Best Literature, and gives you the opportunity of owning the very books you want, whether they are many or few, bound uniformly, at the lowest price ever asked for finely-made books.

In Leather 70c. In Cloth 35c.

Everyman's Library is under the general editorship of Professor Earnest Rhys, assisted by such eminent scholars as Rt. Hon. James Bryce, Sir Oliver Lodge, A. C. Swinburne, Andrew Lang, G. K. Chesterton, T. Watts-Dunton, Prof. Saintsbury, Hilaire Belloc, Arthur Symonds, Canon Beeching, Lord Avebury, and Augustine Birrell.

You will find almost any standard book you desire in Everyman's Library whether you want Fiction, Poetry, Biography, Travel, History, Theology, Romance, Essays or Children's Stories. It includes the books you ought to read, the books you will want to keep in your house and read again, and the books you would like to see your family read. It includes most of the great books that have been written from the dawn of Literature to the close of the Victorian Era.

You may buy one volume of Everyman's Library, if one is all you want, or you may devise some plan or system of buying, and, book by book, acquire a library that will give you much profitable entertainment and cultivate in your children a taste for the best reading.

Books like these can be sold at such remarkably low prices only when they are made in large quantities. The idea behind Everyman's Library is: that selling the classics of literature at the lowest prices ever asked for well-printed, firmly bound books would meet with a buying response from the public that would make such prices possible.

The books are the actual size of the above photograph. Uniformly bound and printed in large, clear type on specially made, opaque paper. They are large enough for comfortable reading, and small enough to be carried in your coat pocket or travelling bag.

Sold by Dealers or when no dealer can supply Sold by Mail

All booksellers and book departments should sell Everyman's Library. Ask where you usually buy books to see a list of the titles; then ask to be shown a volume. To be appreciated these books must be seen. Glance over the specimen titles on this page. The chances are you will find some book that you have wanted badly and feared was out of print or very expensive. Here it can be bought for almost the price of two magazines. Whether your dealer sells Everyman's Library or not,

With children, as with grown-ups, beautiful hair adds much to their personal attractiveness. And it is so easy to keep their hair soft and fluffy that every child should have this charm. Nothing more is required than a little care and Ivory Soap.

Unlike many cleansers, Ivory Soap does not make the hair dry and brittle. This is because it is so mild and pure that the oily secretion of the scalp is not impaired.

Ivory Soap only cleanses, but does it so thoroughly that all the dirt and surplus oil are absorbed by the lather. It then rinses perfectly, and the hair is left in a condition to dry soft, silky and glossy.

A Pleasant and Convenient Way to Use

Ivory Soap for shampooing is in the form of paste. Make a warm suds with the paste. Saturate hair and scalp. Rub the scalp with the paste and dip the suds over it. Rinse with spray or cup, gradually cooling the water. Dry by rubbing, in the sun, if possible, but do not use strong heat.

How to Make Ivory Soap Paste.

Shave a third of a large cake of Ivory Soap into a quart of water, or a small cake into two quarts. Do this with a knife, vegetable grater, or food chopper. Keep nearly, but not quite, at boiling point until the soap is dissolved. When cool, it will be like jelly. Keep in jars.

JAPAN'S IMPERIAL FUNERAL

High Officers of the Army Praying for the Emperor

Burning Incense and Praying for the Emperor in Tokyo

N THE funeral services the late Emperor Mutsuhito Japan the world will have the opportunity witnessing an event as unique as rare, and nothing like has ever happened before. The funeral of a monarch who has occupied his throne for almost half a century is in itself epochal. Only in that mighty pageant of love and simplicity side by side with imperial splendor that bore the remains of the late Queen Victoria of Great Britain to Frogmore has history ever seen the burial of a monarch who has ruled as long and been so deeply loved and highly revered as Mutsuhito.

The ancient and the modern, the Oriental and the newly imbibed ideas and ideals of the West will be seen in strange combination and still stranger juxtaposition. In her governmental, official, military and naval life, Japan has almost entirely adopted, rather than adapted, the forms and ideals of Christian nations, yet she is to all intents and purposes heathen. Of her fifty millions of people less than one million are Christians, and of this number the Emperor was not one. He, as all the 120 rulers of Japan from primitive days down, was a Shintoist, and it is with the rites of that worship he will be buried.

The Shinto funeral, as it has been described by travelers in Japan, is an impressive ceremony, which yet lacks the solemn dignity that associates itself with Christian burial services everywhere except in large cities. The Shinto worship consists largely of a deification of the dead, and strange as it may seem, the sadness which is always associated with our funerals is either entirely lacking or most sedulously concealed. All Japan believes, or politically pretends to believe, the legend of the descent of its emperors from Amaterasu O Mi Koto, the Goddess of the Sun. He is therefore something more than human. The death of a ruler thus adds a new demigod to the long list of heroes and renowned personages who have been so exalted. The beloved Tenno Sama, "The Heavenly Lord Emperor," has "rejoined his imperial ancestors." This title, Tenno Sama, is the one commonly used by the Japanese, and its significance clearly indicates the wide gulf that lies between the Japanese conception of loyalty and love for a sovereign and that which animates the subjects of even the most beloved of Occidental rulers.

Three days will be taken up by the ceremonies of the burial of Mutsuhito. At six o'clock on the morning of September 13 the first private service will take place in the presence of the new Mikado, Yoshihito, and the Dowager Empress Haruko. How long this service will be or of what ceremonies it will consist is unknown. According to the official program, the next event will take place at seven o'clock that evening when the Elder Statesmen, the Peers and all the high officials and foreign representatives are to assemble at the palace, whence the procession will start at eight P.M. Emperor Yoshihito will meet the cortège on the Aoyama Parade Ground. It is expected that this procession will be very long and will offer many strange contrasts. Musicians and torch and lantern bearers of Japan's old régime will find themselves marching with modern carriages behind and before. Many silk-robed priests and officials carrying emblems must still leave space for representatives of the modern army and navy. The funeral car bearing the late Emperor's body is to be drawn by teams of snow-white oxen along the route lined by soldiers of the regular army.

Just after the arrival of the procession at the Aoyama field the funeral service will begin, and will comprise the full and imposing Shinto ritual. After the service the Emperor will personally read a tribute to the dead monarch, and this will be followed by another read by the Empress Dowager, who will be succeeded by the ministers of state and others, the musicians meanwhile continuing to play funeral airs.

When these ceremonies and orations are finished the funeral train will start for Kioto, where the interment is to be made. A special station has been built at Momoyama, and here the train is scheduled to arrive at 5.10 P.M. on September 14. A procession similar to that in Tokyo will conduct the Emperor's remains to their last resting-place. More memorial poems and tributes will then be read beside the tomb. On the following day the concluding ceremonies will be conducted by the Shinto priests. These, it is supposed, will consist of the actual rites of committal to the earth. The arrangement of the obsequies so that the two great processions will take place during the hours of darkness seems passing strange to us, for it is within only the last decade or so that even the thought of holding a respectable funeral at night has come to be tolerated in this country. In Japan, however, all Shinto funerals are conducted at night. The appearance of a burial procession in daylight marks the deceased as having been either a Christian or a Buddhist.

The body of Mutsuhito, clothed in the uniform of a generalissimo of the army, is now lying in state in a white silk-lined room in the Imperial Palace at Tokyo. The funeral ceremonies assume the aspect of an international event when it is realized that all the great nations of the world will be represented by special embassies. To mark the cordial relations that have existed with the United States from the time of Admiral Perry and Townsend Harris, and continuing through the long reign of the late Emperor, President Taft has sent Secretary Knox as his special and personal representative at the obsequies. The special mission consists also of an admiral of the navy, Rear Admiral Oscar F. Stanton, U.S.N., retired; a general of the army, Brigadier General John J. Pershing, commanding the Department of Mindanao, Philippines; and a secretary, Mr. Ransford S. Miller, chief of the Division of Far Eastern Affairs, State Department, Washington, D. C. Secretary Knox, who with this party and Mrs. Knox is now traveling to Japan on the armored cruiser Maryland, expects to arrive in Yokohama on September 10.

It has been announced that Prince Henry of Prussia, who a few years ago visited the United States, will be present at the funeral as the representative of his brother, Emperor William of Germany. No definite pronouncement has been made as to Great Britain's representative, but it is generally believed that Prince Arthur of Connaught, King George's nephew, will fill this

A HERO OF THE CROSS

THE life of Griffith John is one to stir to its depths every soul who is awake to the splendor of courageous and noble living. His whole career, now that he is gone, flashes forth like a rebuke upon our modern, easy-going ways. He was consumed by one passion, and one only—to help in saving China for the kingdom of Christ. And that passion carried him back to China when he was not far from eighty years old, after he had been compelled to rest for a year on account of failing health.

A standard encyclopedia, in its sketch of Dr. John's career, states that he retired from the life of an active missionary in 1906, and was residing in the United States. There were some brave chapters to be added after that. Back to his field of labor the old man journeyed, lived through the revolution which brought nearer the new China of which he had dreamed, and at last, in his eighty-first year, when the hostilities about Hankow became so perilous that the missionaries were compelled to turn toward the coast, with his physical strength exhausted and his great intellect in partial eclipse, he reached England last January, and on July 25 went to his rich reward.

For fifty-six years he lived for China. He cared not for recreation, for rest, even for furloughs. He visited England only once from the time he sailed to his work in 1855 until he returned last January to die. When he needed recreation, he took an evangelistic tour through the country districts of China, and in the preaching of the old Gospel he found new strength.

The Christian World, of London, commenting upon his life and work, says:

"Griffith John was first and foremost a preacher and an evangelist. He translated the Bible into Chinese, the New Testament alone taking him twenty years; he founded the Central China Tract Society, whose yearly output is now nearly three million publications; he wrote and published scores and even hundreds of tracts and booklets; but it was by preaching that he aimed supremely at making Christian disciples among the Chinese people. To make Christ known to China was his consuming passion. He founded at Hankow a hospital, a high school, a normal school and a medical school; but pioneering as a preacher of the spoken Word was his chief joy. His keen eyes were ever upon new fields to enter and conquer. At enormous risk to life and limb he penetrated into fresh cities, preaching the Gospel and teaching the Scriptures. For that work, he said, 'one feels that he could dare and endure anything.'"

But even more remarkable than his work was the spirit of the man. He had overcome and slain one of the most subtle temptations that can beset the Christian worker—the desire for recognition and fame. Converted at the age of eight, Griffith John began to preach at fourteen, and from sixteen to eighteen won remarkable attention as a "boy preacher." People flocked to hear him and were tremendously moved. He was thought to be the new prophet of evangelism sent to awaken his own people. But being urged to attend college, he felt there the higher call to be a missionary. It is hard to estimate the severity of that struggle. Called to preach, fired with spiritual ardor and power for th task, gifted almost miraculously with eloquence i his native tongue, welcomed by his people, t turned away from it all to a strange land, a strang race, a strange tongue. He expressed thus in late years what it was that had taken place: "The mi sionary desire came in and took possession of m heart," and the lower desire to become famous a a preacher was "driven out never to return. He adds: "This was one of the greatest victorie ever won in the arena of my soul." How com plete the victory was may be guessed from th fact that in 1889, when the Congregationa Union elected him its chairman, he declined th honor, and when, some years later, he was agai nominated for this high office, he withdrew fro the ballot. He lived only to work, and h worked only because he loved the souls of me and the Christ who had died to redeem them.

The Late Dr. Griffith John

Dr. John was the first missionary to Centra China. For five years after reaching the for eign field, in 1855, he resided at Shanghai. I 1861 he went to Hankow, which remained unti the end the headquarters of his great work. H traveled through large portions of nine of th eighteen provinces of China, most of the time o foot, and in four of these provinces he was th first preacher of the Gospel. Mr. Nelson Bitton writing for the Christian World, paints thi charming picture of one of the last days in th life of this rare old soldier of the Cross:

"The last day that I spent with Griffith John in the year 1908, is vivid in my memory as I write. We traveled out from Hankow to Hsiaokau, where the doctor was to spend the week-end with the Christians of the church he had established a generation before, in a city which had been wholly hostile to his work and opposed to his entrance. Once in Hsiaokau, he was like a boy in his keenness to see all that was going on. He must visit the lepers and mark with emphatic admiration the perfect little chapel which had been erected for them under Dr. Fowler's superintendence. Then nothing would do but we must go with him to see the small Chinese house which had been his dwelling thirty years before. And as we went through the streets where, in the old days, he had been reviled and mobbed, the word went round that this was the lao muhsz—venerable pastor—from Hankow. I bade him farewell that evening, making my way back to Hankow, and the last words of this invariable optimist were: 'Believe in the good things ahead, my brother.'"

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—DURING THE FIRST week of August one of the most remarkable conventions that the world has ever seen took place in Paris, France. Several thousand deaf-mutes representing almost every country on earth were gathered together to consider ways and means for the advancement of the interests of those similarly afflicted throughout the world. Speeches were delivered in the sign languages of all the countries represented, and discussions were carried on which led to the inauguration of a movement for the creation of a universal sign language. Such strange scenes as a Hindoo, a Turk, an Englishman and a Russian, each in distinctive dress, carrying on an excited and earnest discussion without a single sound were not at all uncommon. The accompanying photograph shows one of the incidents of the first day of the convention, when the delegates were just beginning to gather.

A French Delegate Delivering an Address of Welcome in Sign Language —COUNSELOR CLARENCE DARROW, who was on trial on the charge of bribery in the case of the McNamara brothers, the dynamiters of the Los Angeles Times, has been acquitted.

—THE PROPOSED amendment to the Constitution to limit the Presidency to a single term of six years was killed in the Senate on August 20, for the present session at least. Senator Borah was the chief opponent of the measure. He insisted that the honor of being elected a second time was an incentive to the proper exercise of the powers of the Presidency.

—IT IS REPORTED that a cloudburst, followed by the heaviest downpour in the history of Montana, occurred on August 19. All train schedules were temporarily abandoned, washouts on every Eastern Montana line rendering regular service impossible.

—AT A LARGE meeting in Indianapolis for the notification of Governor Marshall of his nomination as Democratic candidate for Vice-President, the grand-stand collapsed, carrying 300 persons with it. Seventy-five persons were injured, five severely, and a panic was narrowly averted.

—THE NEW JERSEY BRANCH of the Lutheran Synodical Conference July 16 adopted a resolution that, for the protection of the innocent, the State, before issuing a marriage license, should demand a satisfactory medical certificate from both the contracting parties to the marriage. The resolution was prompted by the fact that of 50,000 blind children in the United States, 12,000 lost their sight in consequence of disease in the parents.

—WITH A PARTY of friends from the United States, Harry Payne Whitney recently started from London for his annual shooting party upon the Scottish grouse moors he leases from the Earl of Strathmore. The shooting he has afforded the four friends in his party will cost Mr. Whitney more than $75,000. That is the sum the wealthy American pays a year for the Holwick grouse moors, which he uses only a few days annually. This year the rental will be largely increased by incidental expenses. Mr. Whitney has engaged more than one hundred beaters to drive game for the party, and the other expenses of entertaining the gunners will be large. The Holwick moors are among the best known in Scotland. This event has caused a storm of protest in the British press. As England's great problem is to find room for her people, it is proclaimed an outrage that these lands should be held year after year by one man who uses them only for sport a few days each year.

—THE TURKISH Foreign Minister recently confirmed the report that semi-official peace negotiations with Italy are proceeding and some definite result in Tripoli would not be surprising. The chiefs of the tribes in the interior of Tripoli refuse to countenance talk of peace. At a recent conference of the prominent Arab leaders, it was resolved, in the event of Turkey and Italy arranging terms, to proclaim the autonomy of Tripoli and to continue the war until overwhelmed. Turkish officers who were present at the assemblage swore that they would remain in Tripoli and fight on the side of the Arabs. The chiefs say they have food sufficient to last them three years, but they need a supply of ammunition. They already have selected a provisional government.

—AN AMERICAN soldier of fortune, James Ward Rogers, a native of Wayland, Allegan County, Mich., who at different times resided in a number of places in California, met his death recently in the jungles of Africa, at the hands of British soldiers, who had been tracking him through the jungles and forests for several weeks. Rogers was a modern freebooter and outlaw. He had defied the laws and customs and authorities of every African country he had entered. For years along the boundaries of the Congo he carried on a career as an elephant poacher and illicit ivory trader, netting, it is believed, a large fortune. The British officials of the Soudan made every effort to trap him, but without avail until Captain Fox, Inspector of the Mongalla Province, set out after him about the beginning of July and ran him to earth on the banks of the Uganda. Rogers was shot in one of the skirmishes that ensued, but managed to get to his own camp, where he later sent for Captain Fox. The British officer removed the bullet from Rogers's wound and nursed him for four days, until his death. Rogers's death occurred on Belgian territory, and Captain Fox immediately reported to the nearest Belgian court what had occurred. He was escorted to the boundary by a Belgian force, which took possession of the other prisoners, two white companions of Rogers and about one hundred natives.

THE PASSING OF GENERAL BOOTH

Evangeline Booth

Commander of the Salvation Army Forces in America

IN THE passing of Rev. William Booth, the venerable founder and general of the Salvation Army, one of the most romantic figures of the religious life of the last half century has been removed. On August 21 the announcement came from his home, the Rookstone, at Hadleywood, near London, that the General had passed away the previous evening. He is survived by his sons, William Bramwell, Ballington and Herbert Booth, and his daughters, Evangeline Booth and Mrs. Booth-Helberg.

The aged leader's health had been failing for several months, and the end came not unexpectedly. On the previous Monday night his condition was known to be hopeless, and it was then obvious that the termination of his remarkable career was near. On May 24 last General Booth had an operation performed for the removal of a cataract from his left eye. For two days after the operation indications justified the hope that the General would ultimately recover. Then, however, septic poisoning set in, and m that time to the end his immediate household feared that it could not be er than a losing fight. During his illness General Booth had the unremit- g attention of his son Bramwell Booth, who is the Chief of Staff of the vation Army, as well as of his son Herbert, Mrs. Bramwell Booth, and his granddaughter, Miss herine Booth.

The failure of the operation on his eyes to restore sight came as a severe blow to the General and his followers. When the announcement was de that all hope of saving his sight was gone, he azed all associated with him by the courage h which he faced the black prospect. He issued the Salvation Army throughout the world the lowing remarkable statement:

'In a few brief hours my comrades may be under painful compulsion of announcing that the neral is hopelessly blind. In that event, what an escribably painful loss will be mine, never again see the light of day, or behold the countenances my friends, or look into the sympathetic eyes of comrades; never again to witness that which for r sixty years has been to me the sight of sights— n and women kneeling at the mercy-seat.

'Then, too, I have lost the hope of being able with facility to write, while it will be an absolute possibility to read well. Pile up all my losses, ey are many and serious, I admit; but look at the cies left me!

'First, there is my confidence in God. I am not ng to allow the existence of a few things which e in conflict with my judgment to interfere with confidence in his wisdom—confidence that is in- ed by a lifelong knowledge of his loving care en, I have not lost the assurance of my own ppy relations with my heavenly Father. I have t lost the confidence and love of my own dear ople."

The morning following his death the English pers paid the highest possible tributes to his emory. They gave him a prominent place ong the illustrious company of the world's great ligious leaders. He has undoubtedly left behind m a vital record of his life's activity in the ser- ce of a great cause, and in the organization which survives him a monument himself in every civilized country. William Booth became a world figure rough the working out of two ideas which at first seemed to give little omise of their ultimate development. These ere to combine charity and religion in a practi- l way and to organize a Christian army on lines nilar to those of the military establishments of e nations. Few pages in the world's religious d social history are more picturesque and dra- atic than the organization and growth of the ighty army of peace which is the outcome of ese two ideas. In 1844 the army had its humble ginning in talks delivered from an ash-barrel lpit in the slums of Nottingham, England, by a ung evangelist, who had not the faintest dream at his simple, earnest efforts to carry the Word God to people who would not go to God's house hear it would ever culminate in the organiza- on of a great body of workers commissioned to ach and to help the unchurched masses the orld around. He was not an ordained minister, t just a devout Christian lad, who worked at his cular employment until eight o'clock every ght, and then went forth "to an open air meet- g, a prayer meeting, or the bedside of the sick d the dying." His mother was a widow, and he r support. At the age of fifteen he had been nverted in a Wesleyan Chapel, and had immedi- ely set about seeking lost souls. At seventeen was appointed a local preacher and urged to ter the ministry, but various obstacles pre- nted. Yet on Sundays he tramped from village to village, preaching in church after church. Observing his congregations, he noted that one class did not come; "the 90 per cent. of the working classes, whose cathedral was the saloon, whose sacrament was a drunken bout, and whose Bible the penny-dreadful," would not seek the sanctuary, so he went to them. From his ash-barrel pulpit a tatterdemalion throng followed him into cottage meetings; then marched singing down the Goosegate into a chapel. From Nottingham he went to Cornwall; then to London's most famous place of evil—the Whitechapel district. An old tent in a disused Quaker burial ground in the East End was one station of expansion. It was blown down, and a dance hall became the meeting-place on Sundays, while an old unused wool warehouse on Bethnal Green served the same purpose through the week. By this time the movement had received the name of the Christian Mission. The exact origin of the name "Salvation Army" seems rather indefinite, but this is the most generally accepted story. Some one asked a definition of the Christian Mission of one of the ex-prize fighters, who was a leading worker. He replied that it was a volunteer army for the salvation of the poor. General Booth, who overheard this, immediately said, "A Salvation Army," and so the name was born. The military organization was a matter of later introduction. To catch the eye of the Whitby fishermen, the title "Captain" was introduced as a nautical rather than as a military term. One night a Captain Cadman referred to William Booth as "the General of the Salvation Army." "The name has stuck to me ever since," General Booth once remarked, "I never took the title. It seemed to grow fast, so I decided to sanction it." It was soon evident that military organization, terms and discipline would solidify his forces and advance the great end he had in view, and this led to the introduction of that type of organization.

The Late William Booth

Founder and General of the Salvation Army

This action led to considerable censure in England, where military titles mean more and are more strictly guarded as to usage than they are in this country. People said Booth was mad, and he and his band came in for rather rough attention from the street crowds. The throwing of sticks and stones and mud became so common that the members of the Army considered it simply an incident in the day's work and paid little attention to it.

William Booth was an enthusiast, but he was practical, and he realized that every day's work carried him nearer the goal for which he was striving. The basest of pecuniary motives were attributed to him, and this, for a time, made trouble, but he and his organization by their untiring efforts have lived down that accusation and have come to enjoy the sincerest support and admiration of the general public. Of late years the members of his great army could go where they pleased in their uniforms without fear of violence, of misunderstanding, or of jeers. From this small and undignified beginning has grown the Army which now consists of 4,611 corps and outposts that reach throughout the civilized world. No possible attempt can be made to state the activities of the Salvation Army in figures. Thousands of the poor have been fed and lifted to a higher plane of living; thousands have been led to accept Christ as their personal Saviour, and still more thousands have been taken at the doors of prisons and led back to lives of usefulness and respectability, and from the streets of the great cities of the world nearly thirty thousand young women have been rescued from the depths of shame and given a new hold on life and decency. So great was the respect in which the founder of the organization had come to be held that sympathy was extended to his family by the heads of two great nations. King George V of Great Britain sent this message:

"I am grieved to hear the sad news of the death of your father. The British nation has lost a great organizer and the poor a whole-hearted and sincere friend who devoted his life to helping them in a practical way. Only in the future shall we realize the good wrought by him for his fellow-creatures. To-day there is universal mourning for him. I join in it and assure you and your family of my true sympathy in the heavy loss which has befallen you.

(Signed) GEORGE, R. I."

President Taft cabled the following statement to W. Bramwell Booth:

"In the death of your good father the world loses one of its most effective practical philanthropists. His long life and great talents were dedicated to the noble work of helping the poor

QUEST AND CONQUEST

A SERMON

BY

Rev. Chas. A. Eaton, D.D.*

TEXT: "Oh that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat! I would order my cause before him, and fill my mouth with arguments." Job 23: 3, 4. (Also Rom. 8th chapt

THERE are certain hungers or directions resident in human nature which, under the impulse of instinct from within or necessity from without, determine the course of every life. The first of these we call the appetites. That is to say, when a child is born, he immediately becomes dependent upon the earth for his existence. He never can escape from that necessity. Whether the child be born in a palace or a cottage, in the city or upon the farm, always, every day, his body is related to the earth, depends upon the earth, and cannot escape from that dependence any more than one can escape from his own personality.

There is also the instinct for thought. The difference between a rational and an irrational being lies here: that under an urgent impulse, whether it be from God or from beneath or from within, the child is directed at once to an inquiry. A babe has no notion of distance. He must determine by reasoning whether an object is a mile or a league or a foot or an inch from his eye. He must determine in the same way whether he is looking upon his father or mother or friend or enemy. The eye reports to the mind, and the mind reasons.

The Hunger of the Soul

Deeper than these, as universal as these, more spiritual and more immortal than these, is another hunger, the hunger for God. When it is not enlightened by reason or by revelation, this appears under grotesque forms. This hunger for God has produced the low forms of religious life common among savages. It has produced the mystic philosophies of India. It has produced the granite morality of the Chinese. It has produced the wonderful traditions of the North American Indian about the Great Spirit and the Common Father. It has produced Christianity. It has produced the Bible. It is the most elementary and the most vigorous and the most resistless impulse of human nature.

Now, judging from appearances, it would seem as if that hunger were dying out of men. A young business man of position, intelligence, and character said to me within a week, standing in one of the great hotels of this city and looking at the people: "How much attention these people pay to their food!" I have been thinking that over. Looking upon the civilization of a great city like this, it would seem that these millions, rushing to and fro, eating and drinking and working and playing and forgetting God—it would seem as if this hunger had no place in their lives and never did have and never could have. But that is only a superficial and incidental view. A man in some inaccessible mountain upon some inaccessible island of the sea, marooned from and forgotten by his fellows, discovers vast deposits of gold. It is of no use to him. It is real gold, and he is a real man. But its value depends upon his being in society among other men, where he can give and take and buy and sell and realize his social nature. The sunset is glorious, but not to the blind. The symphony of the great artist is exquisite, but not to the deaf. Food is beautiful and good, but not to the sick. Love is lovely, but not to the insane. So that it is possible for these people who rush to and fro like swine to their gilded troughs—it is possible to say of them that this impulse after something other and greater than themselves has been changed and degraded until perhaps, in its inflamed and degraded and diseased condition, it is responsible for the very unrest which they seek to satisfy by a pernicious activity. These hungers and impulses after God are the most common of all the powers of human nature.

The Only Satisfaction

Come down the centuries to the man who wrote this letter to the Romans, a man of equally high position socially to that occupied by Job; a man of unquenchable zeal for righteousness, of a deep hunger after God; a man who stood, by virtue of his intellect and character, in the very van of leadership among his people. He has had a strange experience. In place of peace, there has come turmoil and struggle. In place of the admiration of his fellows, he now receives their hatred. He has been hungry and thirsty and naked. He has been almost lost upon the sea. He has been turned out of one city and welcomed to a prison in another. In the distant future, growing nearer every moment, he sees himself approaching death at the hands of the law. In the midst of such crushing experiences, this great Titanic man stands forth and proclaims his persuasion that nothing can separate him from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus his Lord.

What makes the difference between Job who cries: "Oh that I knew where I might find him!" and Paul who is persuaded that nothing can separate him from the love of God? The difference is supplied in this word: Jesus Christ. We then have, in contemplating this universal hunger after God and the strange vicissitudes through which it drives human nature, two permanent facts: the hunger itself and its supply in Jesus Christ.

What is it that Jesus does for a man to satisfy him? First of all, our Lord reorganizes and rearranges the warring energies of human nature. Men have capacity for peace, for happiness. You business men know that if you were to enter your office and find your bookkeeping far behind, so that you could not tell how much you owe nor who owes you, it would disturb you deeply. If you are orderly and have capacity for business, you would address yourself to that situation until you had healed it and made your business a real, rational organization around you, the expression of a well-ordered mind; the expression of a definite purpose and policy. So human nature is in its essence disorganized. Conscience says one thing, the will another, the intelligence still another. These elemental forces of our nature are arrayed one against another until we find ourselves plunged into spiritual chaos. We cry with Paul: "Oh, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" The first thing Jesus does for a man is to restore harmony among his warring powers. Just as he drove out demons, and restored the sightless eye and healed the deaf ear, so, when he penetrates to the moral nature of a man, he puts the regnant power of conscience once more upon the throne; he regulates the intellect so that we can discern what is right and what is wrong; he stimulates the will so that we have the energy to do the thing we ought to do. The first thing Jesus does for a man is to regulate and inspire and adjust his own inner powers among themselves.

Christ the Truth

The next thing Jesus does for a man is to clarify his vision of truth. The greatest contribution which Jesus has made to the world, apart from his redeeming work, is his revelation of truth. Men have been haunted since the beginning with a conception that truth is mathematics. Two and two make four; three and three make six; three times three makes nine. Quod erat demonstrandum.

"These principles can never change." But they do change. If two and two make four of money coming to you, that looks one way. If two and two make four of money you owe, then it looks another way. If two and two make four, and that is your children, if they are alive and with you, that is one thing; but if two and two make four, and their graves are out on the hillside, that is another proposition. That is to say, you, being a man, must put personal considerations into all your reasoning if you are to rise to the full height of your manhood. When Jesus came, his great contribution was truth —not mathematics, but truth, alive, personal, vital: "I am the Truth." When Jesus enters into your life he takes the intelligence which God has given you and lifts it up and clarifies it and gives it a new standard of measurement, a new telescope through which it can see long distances, a new microscope which reveals the beauties of God's grace and justice within and without. It clarifies your reasoning power until you find room within your mind for sympathy, and right, and love, and time, and eternity.

Then, best of all, and last of all, and first of all, Jesus, as he enters into one's life, brings God within the compass of a man's understanding. I know that men do not find God because they do not know where to find him. They seek him in the sound of the winds and they feel the winds blowing upon them and hear the sound thereof, but cannot tell whence they come nor whither they go. They see him in the beauties of nature, and they find themselves involved in the question whether nature is the incarnation of love or law, of life or death. They seek him in the mysterious temple of their own nature, and their search ends in chaos and confusion and they sink into darkness. Men have sought God through all the ages and have found him partially, have caught glimpses of him, have seen fair outlines of his glory. But it was given to the Lord Jesus to bring God down out of the sky, to bring him in from the vast immensities of space, to bring him out of the great silence of his spiritual existence and place him in some compass where men can understand him.

Such was the conscious life of Jesus. He is the supreme medium by means of which men may understand and make response to God. This is his great contribution to you and me. He has brought God within the compass of our human powers so that we can understand and respond to him.

The Reason and the Cure

And now I want to bring this word into your life and mine. You are a Christian. You have been one for many years. Perhaps away back when you were a little boy in some revival meeting, your childish nature was stirred by an appeal, and you united with the church. Many times since you have wondered if that was not a fatal mistake on your part because the childish fervor soon passed away like the bloom upon summer flowers when touched by frosts, and all you have is a blasted flower as a memory of that sweet childish experience long ago. You have retained your membership in the church. You have not been joyous as a Christian. You have not been active as a Christian. If your pastor asked you to do anything in the church, it was not because you did not have the power to respond that you said "No." It was not because you are lacking in equipment; it was not because you have been a failure in your business; it was not because you have no intelligence that you have refused. It is because you have no passion that drives you in that direction. You have attended church pretty regularly, and given sometimes. But when a man speaks to you about Jesus, you look confused, you look half ashamed. He is speaking about something that is not a reality to you. Your eye does not kindle with joyous response. Your voice does not fill and thrill with an accent of personal passion when you begin to talk about Jesus. You are embarrassed because there is nothing in your life that corresponds to what Jesus seems to be in his message.

I have presented to you the way along which, if you follow to its glad conclusion, you will find a reason and a cure for these wasted years of your church membership which are a terrible tragedy for you. Every man must appear before the judgment seat of Christ. These sleek, well-fed worldlings will some day be trembling, as they stand before God and try to explain why they stood like swine in the trough and never raised so much as the tip of a finger when men were dying around them in this vast godless maelstrom of modern life. God will find them and you and me when he wants us. Though we be seated in our palace, the door double-locked, that silent stranger will find us. He will not even stop to note the beauty of our flowers and admire our mural decorations. He will step behind us and touch us on the shoulder, and we shall instantly follow him like the most abject slave. Every man must appear before the judgment seat of God to give an account. If any of you men have ever served as the trustee or administrator of an estate, you know what utmost care you must exercise in the handling of its funds. Why? Because you are going to appear before the judge at periodical times to give an account. It won't do to say, "I think so," or "I guess." You have got to know, down to the last penny for a postage stamp, because you are administering a trust fund, and the law

LIFE'S HARMONY

ERE'S a legend old I have somewhere heard
d it comes so oft to me, the thought so often my heart has stirred l I long and long to be ve that my part in life's harmony ght sound no discordant tone e song that rises so ceaselessly, at will echo on and on all of the singers have passed away he land of light and the perfect day.

ld you know this legend of long ago, wonderful story that haunts me so?
this, that the voices of earth and air one in life's harmony great must bear rt, for the least may not silent be, must sound out its message in its own key, echoing on through space for aye, ote into silence may die away.
uld all be right if a melody sweet ld ever and ever itself repeat, might and power it swept along it filled the universe wide with song.
oh, if the tones were harsh and shrill, ver and ever discordant still,
'd echo and ring till the sweetest strain ld strive to be heard by all in vain, the harsh, wild discords the harmony ld mar and destroy all the melody.

hen would I strive each day to fill place in life's music as God may will, t only my sweetest notes may be ver heard in the melody.

Quest and Conquest

ds you absolutely responsible. You trustee of a greater estate than l ever be administered by men, in twenty-four hours of every day t God has given you in your existe here. By and by you will stand ore him to give an account of the rs and hours and minutes of this den life. Oh, things look differly here from what they will look ore the judgment seat of Christ! se indeed is the man who aphes his life from that point of w now, so that when he is called he l be like Paul, in a strait betwixt o, having a desire to depart and be th Christ, which is far better. Judgnt is nothing to him. The terror of law has been obliterated. He will nd before the judgment seat of rist some day. He will stand there riously triumphant, at perfect ace because Christ is with him and ims him as his own.

My dear friend, my sister, my other, in your long years of church ationship which have turned out to largely for you a matter of relius instinct grown cold, a matter of m instead of substance (it does not p you in your business, it does not p you in your home, still less in the ess and torment of your own be), I bid you to mark this day as the ginning of a new age.

Are you seeking God and have not nd him? Go not up into the avens, go not down into hell, go not the uttermost parts of the earth, hough he is there, for in him ye e and move and have your being; t come to Jesus, to the human rist and the divine. Bow before n. Open the windows of your spirit him, and he will come in and bring th him the Father, and then you will ow as you are known.

It is so much better than we had red to hope to be a Christian. Many you here have not got as much out your religion as you expected. I ll you, in the name of Jesus, that it very much greater and better to be Christian than we dared to expect. Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, ither hath it entered into the heart man, the things which God hath epared for them that love him" in e next world. It is equally true of is. If you are still in a quest for od and know nothing of the conquest your life in his presence and power, rn away from Job; get acquainted ith Paul, and through Paul with aul's Christ, and through Christ with s God. Then thou shalt live.

"THE TONGUE OF THE DUMB SHALL SING"

SOME ONE has said that an affliction may be one of the first aids to success, and a physical handicap is often a positive help to mastery because it spurs the possessor to greater mental and spiritual effort and challenges his will to prevail in the struggle.

A thrill went through the heart of the nation when it was announced the other day that Helen Keller sang at the Otological Congress in Cambridge, Mass. Blind, deaf and dumb from infancy, this young woman, with all the world seemingly shut out from her grasp, has conquered her tremendous handicap by the power of her will, the loving patience of her teachers, and the outreaching eagerness of her own soul. She has said unto this mountain, "be removed." She has emerged from her physical prison and claimed her place among living, working men and women. She who could not utter a word can now carry on a conversation over the telephone. She has addressed in three languages, English, French, and German, a congress of scientists who came from all parts of the world. As the crowning achievement, this girl who could not see notes, who formerly could not even utter speech, sang clearly and sweetly, so that her voice reached every corner of the great room and her audience was moved to tears.

"Almost it is a miracle!" exclaimed the scientists. Almost? Never was there more truly a miracle than the bringing of this wonderful girl up out of the tomb of silence and realizing in her the promise of Isaiah that "the tongue of the dumb shall sing." A miracle of science truly, but with the Omnipotent hand working through science and opening the understandings of men to the marvelous mechanism of the human body and brain.

But the miracles of to-day are not of sudden achievement. Most of them are performed only by persistent, heroic effort. Explosive action or spontaneous combustion is less a miracle than steady, progressive growth. The building of a house in a day, as was done not long ago, was less of a miracle than the growing of the timber which entered into its construction. A man may suddenly be given position or wealth by some unexpected turn of events. There is no miracle in such a happening comparable with that performed by the young man who begins with nothing but a strong purpose and fights his way up inch by inch, day by day, year by year, against all manner of obstacles until he achieves position, wealth or power through the victory of his own effort.

SENATOR GORE of Oklahoma is another example of such miraculous achievement in the face of the worst physical handicap. When an eight-year-old boy he lost one eye through an accident. Three years later he lost the other eye by another accident. Since then he has been totally blind. He had not gained even common schooling, because his father was poor. The world of work and of men was blotted out of his sight, but within him his soul was alive. One day, when he was fifteen, he sat on a box in his father's barn down in Mississippi and listened to a chum read to him from the Congressional Record. What boy chooses such a story book nowadays? A vision came into his young soul. A hot flash of purpose thrilled him. At that moment the blind boy nominated himself for United States Senator. He followed the gleam through the dark, hard days and years that followed. He worked, and he grew, and he won. When he was led to his seat of honor, which he has occupied with honor ever since, he had achieved the kind of miracle which makes manhood great wherever it is performed, and which has been, through the centuries, the miracle by which, under divine blessing, the nation itself has gained its greatness.

YOUNG men and young women who have eyes to see, ears to hear, and tongue to speak may well compare their efforts and their achievements with those won by Helen Keller, Senator Gore and others like them. The world has no sympathy with the well-equipped athlete who cannot win in a race with a cripple. If without sight, and hearing, and voice, marvelous self-development and brilliant accomplishment are possible, what should the young men and women who have all these things not be able to do?

We read in the parable of the man who had only one talent and became discouraged and hid it away unused, while the man with the ten talents employed them profitably. By a surprising reversal of the parable, we are finding many of the one-talent competitors to-day outstripping the ten-talent men. It is so hard to win in the fierce competition of life when there is only one talent as the initial capital, that the possessor employs it to the utmost—and wins. It is so easy to stride out into the world and take the high places when one has ten talents to start with, that often the ten talents are carelessly frittered away and lost and the owner "begins with shame to take the lowest place."

The wise father does not make everything "as easy as possible" for his son whom he sends out into the world to find his own place. He knows strength and endurance come not that way. He knows that as strong muscles knit themselves upon the bones, and the frame broadens and grows tough by physical exercise, so strong powers knit themselves upon the spirit and it broadens and grows mighty through the grim struggle with obstacles. The severe physical struggles have their analogy in the spiritual struggle. Only after the battle comes the victory and only for him that overcometh is laid up the crown.

TO A MOTHER

PRAY not to keep him here—
This little child with wonder in his eyes
Whose troubled soul looks forth
As though in quest of its lost Paradise

He did but lose his way.
And wandered down the rugged path to earth
From fields Elysian;
And thou in pain and travail gave him birth.

And now because they call—
Those comrade souls who miss his winsome smile—
Weep not, O mother-heart;
This be thy joy: "I held him close awhile."

RENA STILLMAN.

A Remarkable Prayer

ON THE assembling of the Progressive Party's Convention in Chicago on August 5, the opening prayer was offered by Rev. T. F. Dornblaser, pastor of Grace Lutheran Church, Chicago, Ill. His petition was in many respects a remarkable one. First, it was admittedly the longest prayer on record as ever having been offered in a political convention. Second, it was read from typewritten sheets, and during its delivery the speaker gestured after the manner of orators. Then it was an intensely earnest prayer, dealing with great vital issues which he described in burning words that aroused the audience to frequent ejaculations of "Amen!" "Good!" "Good!" Public wickedness in every form was unsparingly denounced. Our nation had become puffed up with the spirit of pride and vainglory; our strength as a world-power had made us boastful and defiant. While there are many public wrongs and individual sins which ought to lead us to repentance and humiliation, we have sinned as a nation, trampled upon the commandments, and sinned against the red man and the black man. We have encouraged mercenary and soulless corporations. We have sinned against the white man, the woman and the child. We have had our money sharks, our political manipulators, our Pharaohs of industry and crooked finance, and "we have ground the faces of the poor and made their lives bitter with hard bondage." For all these we should cry for mercy and forgiveness.

"Throughout the history of the nation," he said, "the hand of Providence could be discerned, guiding the Union. We should not be satisfied with past achievements, but go forward to greater victories for humanity. When a nation ceases to be useful and helpful, and fails to fulfil the purpose for which God designed it, it must give place to another. So with political parties. When they have accomplished their aim, and only remain to "fatten upon the public patronage," then it is time that they should be supplanted by others with higher ideals.

He prayed for national guidance; for men of faith and conviction; for renewed liberty and popular government in the nation, leading "to better, loftier and more enduring heights than it has ever attained before"; for political honesty, moral heroism and civic righteousness to take the place of fraud, injustice and moral cowardice in high places; "but if the new party is possessed of no higher ideals than the old one, we have no supplications to offer in its behalf." North and South were both included in this extraordinary prayer and Cuba and Porto Rico were not forgotten. He appealed for the dismissal of all sectional jealousies and that love might prevail throughout the nation, with high ideals as beacon lights to guide the manhood of America. Especially did he pray for the "men and women who are battling against poverty and misfortune," that they might "take on new hope when they see the light of a better day dawning on their embittered lives." He closed with the Lord's Prayer, in which the great audience joined.

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

THIS number seemed harder, but I enjoyed it." "Think these the most difficult questions we have had, but took pleasure in trying to look them up."

Letters like the foregoing show the spirit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible students.

Another writes: "These questions are proving more interesting with each succeeding lesson, and we are deeply interested." Another: "I am deeply interested in the Bible Question Class. It is a strong incentive to 'search the Scriptures.'"

An honest farmer declares: "Some of these questions are too hard for me these busy harvest days." But he found eight correct answers, even in harvest time. Another list is signed: "The Hutchings Family." That calls up a pleasant picture: father, mother, and the boys and girls working together over their Bibles around the dining-room table, and comparing results. They reach the Honor Roll in a group, answering correctly every question but one.

Very different is the picture brought to the mind by another letter. One of our penitentiary students, sending correct answers to ten questions, writes: "I was very much gratified to learn of my success as a member of the Bible Class and to see my name on the roll of honor as a successful contestant. As never before I feel the sore need of a Cruden's Concordance and a good reference Bible." It might not be a bad idea for some member of the class to send a Concordance and reference Bible to this man who, in his prison cell, is searching the Word of God.

OUR FRESH-AIR WAIFS AT MONT-LAWN

IN HAPPY Mont-Lawn, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home among the Rockland hills, nearly two thousand little boys and girls, tenement waifs from the big city, have been guests for this summer. Arrangements are under way for the reception of a thousand more before the Home closes for the season. Never has "The Children's Paradise" looked prettier or the little folks been more happy or contented. There has been no serious sickness and the hospital has been usually without patients.

Visitors have been plentiful, and many have come from long distances to see the children at their meals, to watch them at their games on the great lawn, and to listen to their sweet voices in the Temple. On Sunday the regular two-o'clock service in the Temple has usually a goodly attendance of adults from the nearby villages. Among those who have addressed the children this season are Dr. C. H. Mead, Rev. Lyman Wheaton, Rev. George Sanderson, chaplain of the Tombs prison, New York; Rev. Franklin Babbitt, the venerable rector of Grace Church, Nyack; Rev. Mr. Moore, of Nyack; Rev. Dr. Smith, of Poughkeepsie; Mr. C. V. A. Blauvelt, and Postmaster George Helmke, both of Nyack. Rev. Mr. Howland, of Spring Valley, N. Y., has been present on a number of occasions. At the Saturday afternoon gatherings there have also been entertaining speakers, including Miss Emily Hartwell, of Foochow, China, who described the life of the Chinese children in the great orphanage there, in which two hundred little Chinese boys and girls are supported by patrons provided by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

If those good friends who have contributed toward the maintenance of this beautiful charity could visit Mont-Lawn and hear for themselves the expressions of loving appreciation that fall from the lips of the children, and could note the joy and delight that fill their waking hours, the patrons of Mont-Lawn would feel amply repaid for their generosity. They have brought real gladness into the pinched and parched little lives. "We cannot thank you enough," the larger of the tots tell the teachers, but in their joyous ways and happy faces one can clearly read childish satisfaction and thorough enjoyment.

A Playground Scene at Mont-Lawn

A lady who has visited Mont-Lawn several times and who is greatly in love with the work she saw there, writes, sending a plea for the neglected tenement waifs who have not been so fortunate as to get a holiday thus far. After a tour of the tenement districts in different parts of the city, but especially on the East Side of New York, she thus records h observations:

"There are many little girls and boys who hearts are fairly set on going to the Children Paradise, and great will be their disappointment they cannot be taken. Will not some kind-heart patron provide for them? I have listened to the pleadings, with eyes brimming with hope, mingl with the fear of being left behind. They have su rounded me and hungrily asked, 'Car I go to the country, ma'am?' These l tle Marys, Tommys, Lucys and Mikes (bless their hearts!)—it is so hard put them off with a promise of anoth year. A year is so long to wait. know that the Housemother and all her staff stretch every gift to its u most. It is little short of wonderf what can be done with a few dollars their loving and efficient hands. W must all do what we can to help t children of the poor, and it is a s thing to pass over even one little pitif appeal that rises from the heart to t lips of a neglected child. When th cry is multiplied a thousand time wherever we go in the slums, it is som thing unimaginable. God will sure prosper and bless every one who sends little tenement child to Mont-Lawn. no other way can one's benevolence a complish so much. And even if one not able to do all that could be wished, still a sma gift, joined with many others, will accomplish wh is needed. Truly, every mite counts for doub value at the Children's Paradise."

Contributions in aid of our fresh-air work shou be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible Hous New York. Every gift, however small, will l gratefully acknowledged.

A BABY OF THE FRONTIER

BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

Author of "For the Freedom of the Sea"; "The Two Captains"; "Hearts and the Highway"; "As the Sparks Fly Upward"; etc.

ILLUSTRATED BY GAYLE PORTER HOSKINS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Lieutenant Colonel John H. Compton, in command of four oops, is stationed at Fort Sullivan among the foothills of the g Horn Mountains. The country is in a state of feverish rest, as the Sioux and Cheyenne Indians are on the war-path, d many settlers have been massacred. Colonel Compton's fe, Mary, and their little four-year-old daughter, Ethel Benn, are with him at the fort. There are several other women, ves of officers, and Mrs. Compton's pretty Irish maid, Molly cNeil, who dearly loves the little girl. Molly is very popular th the soldiers, but gives her preference to Private Danny eagher of Troop B. One day an alarm is given, the officer of e guard reports Indians on the hills to the westward, and e troops are ordered to get ready. In the meantime little hel has wandered from the enclosure, the Indians see her, and e chief swoops down on horseback and carries her off. With antic haste the soldiers pursue the marauders, but the colonel nows his men are outclassed in numrs and there are still women to proct in the fort, so he causes the recall be sounded. An investigation is held to how the child got out of the rounds. Private Meagher confesses was his fault in not guarding the gate, t Molly McNeil takes the blame on rself, saying she tempted "the bhoy." he Indians put up a flag of truce, and olonel Compton and his officers meet ree of their leaders. These propose give up the child in return for the rt. The proposition is haughtily reected, and death is threatened to the ttle one. Meagher is put under arrest d is to be courtmartialed. In an inrview with the colonel he suggests at as he will be condemned to death nyway, he be allowed to try to rescue liss Ethel by seeming to desert to the ndians. This is agreed upon, but Marett, an old scout and hunter, who does ot know of the agreement, hears the arefully missimed fire from the fort, nd seeing the deserter running, fires nd wounds him. Meagher falls, but is icked up and carried away by the ndians. Marnett enters the fort and arns of his mistake. He and Lieutennt Hadden then get away to a distant legraph station and summon reinorcements, which arrive under the comand of Colonel Huntley. Colonel ompton is given command of the enre Fourteenth Cavalry, and the War epartment orders a winter campaign gainst the Indians. Leaving two comanies of infantry to garrison the fort, olonel Compton and his command arch out into the snow-covered mounins to search for Chief Dull Knife and is band.

CHAPTER VI

Private Meagher Shows the Way

NEITHER horses nor men had ever sustained such hardships or carried on a campaign under such frightful difficulties as Compton's column encountered. When they started they had been accompanied by a body of Shoshone scouts, but the intense cold and the heavy snowstorms which filled the passes had discouraged these Indian auxiliaries. They had soon straggled away and abandoned the column. Yet they had no difficulty in their trailing because of the skill and devotion of Marnett, who, as chief of scouts, had associated with him a band of hardy, well-skilled, experienced frontiersmen. It resolved itself into a white man's expedition therefore.

Dull Knife and his band had concealed themselves for the winter in the hidden recesses of the mountains, which were traversed in every direction by a network of deep cañons, through many of which flowed icy rivers. The rude, almost impassable trails along the sides of these rifts in the mountains at this time were covered with snow. The regiment had been out of touch with civilization for at least a week; it had penetrated far into the mountain range before its advance was halted, and scouting parties had been sent out from the permanent camp in every direction. Cañon after cañon had been examined with no results whatever. The fierce wind and the drifting snow had obliterated the trails the Cheyennes might have left. Neither scout nor soldier found a trace of them.

The other Indian bands of Sioux and Cheyennes who had been on the warpath the previous summer had been located and were under observation, but Dull Knife's band had so far remained concealed. As it was Dull Knife's band that had carried off the colonel's daughter, Compton was certain that if alive she would be found with this group of Cheyennes. He therefore prosecuted his search with the most desperate determination.

The sufferings of the horses and the soldiers were terrible, but the troopers endured everything without murmuring. They responded to every demand with a cheerful enthusiasm which no cold was able to freeze out of them. Strange pictures they presented, coming in from a scout, or from mounted guard duty, in their great snow-encrusted buffalo overcoats, huge fur caps and gloves, with their beards and moustaches frosted with ice and snow! But it was certain to Compton that the regiment had about reached the limit of human endurance, and that unless Dull Knife were soon found he would have to break camp and return to the fort if he did not wish his men to be frozen to death in that ghastly wilderness of snow and ice.

They plunged desperately on in the drifting snow and the bitter night

Nothing had been heard from Danny Meagher either. No one knew whether he was alive or dead. With despair in his heart, Compton called a council of war, which met around a huge fire in the midst of the camp.

"Gentlemen," he said, "it is evident that the men can't stand this much longer. A more cheerful, willing, courageous lot I have never commanded. They have done everything that mortal man could ask; forage is running low, rations are getting scarce. I dare not keep them out much longer; what do you think?"

Dexter and Calmore, who had both been promoted to majors, looked at each other. Calmore spoke first.

"I hate to say it, colonel, but I suppose you are right, sir."

"Yes," added Dexter, "unless we can find them in a day or two, we'll have to move out."

"We haven't rations for more than four days longer, sir," said the commissary.

"A lot of the men are already suffering from frost-bite; if this keeps up I can't answer for the health of the command, sir," said the surgeon.

"Gentlemen," said the colonel, "I believe it will kill my wife if we come back without the baby."

"I know," said Dexter speaking for all the others.

"Well," said Calmore, "you needn't decide anything to-night. We can't do anything until K troop returns."

"Marnett and Hadden started day before yesterday," said the colonel. Hadden commanded K troop, while its captain was in the East, seriously ill. "They were only rationed for three days; they must be back to-night," the colonel continued. "Well, gentlemen, if they don't bring a favorable report, we will break camp in the morning and go back to Fort Sullivan."

"I hate to do it," growled Dexter.

"And I," added Calmore.

"And think what it means to me," said the colonel; "yet I have no option. I can't let these men freeze to death."

Just before dark that night Hadden and his troop came in. They were covered with frost and snow; some of the men were freezing. The poor horses were in a state of complete exhaustion; they had covered miles of intricate trails, but had found nothing. Disconsolately, dejectedly, they made their report to the colonel.

"He is in there somewhere, curse him!" said old Marnett, brushing the ice from his face with both hands and warming himself by the campfire. "We've jest got to find him."

"I am afraid we can't do it now, old friend," said Compton. "We have just about rations and forage enough to get us back to Fort Sullivan; the men can't stand this any more."

"They've got to stand it," said old Marnett stubbornly. "I'll never go back to the fort and face your wife without that baby, or tidings of her, as long as I can set a horse or pull a trigger."

"That is all very well for you, Marnett, but I am responsible for the lives of these men and the safety of this command. If I were alone I would stay here in these mountains with you until we died before we gave up."

"Colonel," said Dexter, who was standing by, "give us one more day. We could stretch our supplies to cover five days by going on short rations. I know the men; they will take a long chance at starvation before they will go back beaten. I know the United States, too, and the people of this country have got their eyes on this column; we can't afford to go back unsuccessful."

"Let me ascertain the feeling of the men," said Compton.

Leaving the little group around the headquarters fire, the colonel walked from one troop camp to another. What he said to the first, he said in effect to them all; it ran something like this, the men crowding around him to listen:

"Men, we know Dull Knife is in the mountains somewhere, but we haven't yet found him. We've got four days' rations and forage left; we might stretch it to cover five or six. You have shown a courage and devotion and willingness to do everything that men could that's beyond all praise. As I am responsible for you, I should break camp and

William Booth

THE General has laid down his sword. God is with us."

These words, posted at its headquarters in London, announced that the Salvation Army's great leader was dead. His was a rugged sword, wielded with heroic strength. The closing words of the bulletin are an echo of the dying words of Wesley, whom, probably more than any other Christian warrior of the past, General Booth resembled and followed: "The best of all is—God is with us."

God was with General Booth in life; it was that fact that made his colossal achievements possible. God will be with the organization he built and commanded, now that he has gone. His own last audible words were about the promises of God. "They are sure—they are sure if you will only believe."

Remarkable tributes streamed into the headquarters of the Army on the day following the General's death. King George, President Taft and other notables of the world added their messages of sympathy to the words of humbler folk. The President issued a supplementary statement to the press in which he declared that "General Booth was as fully entitled to the term general as any military officer who marshaled his armies in the field." This tribute calls to mind Field Marshal Lord Wolseley's statement that the British army had taken lessons in methods of organization, distribution and control from the Salvation Army.

History alone can make the true estimate of William Booth. It will probably write him down as the greatest religious campaigner and organizer of half a century; one of the towering and most influential figures of his times. To begin work alone, in the face of ridicule, which for years only spread and deepened as the work grew, and to die at the head of an organization numbering thousands of officers and hundreds of thousands of enrolled soldiers, with 4,611 posts scattered over the world; to have wrested from a bewildered church and a hostile world the heartiest confidence and praise; to have been directly and indirectly the means of turning many thousands of wrong-doers to the paths of righteousness; to have fed the hungry and clothed the naked and cared for the orphans; to have found work for the idle and hope for the hopeless; to have brought joy to the broken-hearted and love to the forsaken; to have influenced by his own movement the ideals and methods of other religious bodies; to have changed public sentiment and influenced humanitarian legislation; to have kept alive the ancient truths of the Christian faith while making them potent in the rush and furor of earth's latest and maddest day; to have himself written millions of words, terse and true, and capable of bringing eternal life to men; to have caused the publishing and circulating of other papers and books bearing the words of life to scores of nations of varying speech; to have preached the evangel of Jesus throughout the British Isles and around the world; to die, leaving the words emblazoned on the daily garments of the soldiers of his widespread legions: "Blood and Fire," keeping thus fresh the memory of the death of God's Son for the world's redemption and confidence in the Pentecostal fire of the Holy Ghost—to have done these things is to be great with a greatness that is truly regal.

From the unwelcome infirmity of age, which his stern will and his gigantic labors had kept at bay for many years; from his new calamity of blindness; from the disappointment at realizing that never again could he take his place upon Jehovah's earthly battle ground; from his pain and his cares, the General has gone to receive his crown from the King of kings.

The Salvation Army, mourning him, rallies round its new commander and pledges allegiance to him and to the faith and purposes of his father. Its members realize that the greatness, the worth, the charm of their founder were reflected from the Christ of Nazareth and Calvary. They know that his successor and they themselves may live as the General lived, in the light of Christ's companionship, in touch with his holiness, in league with his power.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is glad to remember that its voice was among the first to welcome the Salvation Army to the United States and to express confidence in its purposes and methods. Its editors knew and loved the General. They personally mourn his loss, and they extend to his successor, General Bramwell Booth, the promise of their prayers and their encouragement in the great work put into his hands.

The General is dead! Long live the General! And to the Army new kindlings of the old fires, new blessings and fresh victories!

The Graft Indictments

JUSTICE is moving slowly but surely in the New York police graft cases. Seven indictments have been found in connection with the murder of Rosenthal the gambler, the indicted parties being ex-Police Lieutenant Becker, who is charged with planning the murder; Jacob Reich (or "Jack Sullivan"), the tool and associate of Becker; Harry Horowitz, "Leftie Louie" Rosenzweig, "Dago Frank" Cirosici, and "Whitey" Lewis (the four gunmen who are believed to have been the actual assassins), and William Shapiro, the driver of the car that bore the murderers to the scene of their crime. All seven are under arrest except Horowitz and Rosenzweig, for whose capture a heavy reward is offered. Link by link the chain of evidence is being completed against Becker and his associates. Even the hiding-places of their ill-gotten graft in banks and safety vaults have been traced. Their criminal deeds, which they believed to be safely concealed, are all coming to light, and the men "higher up" have lost their defiant attitude and are stricken with trepidation.

It would surprise nobody if the grafting exposures, when they are finally disclosed, should cause a municipal upheaval and a moral revolution. The Temple of Graft has been shaken to its foundations, and the whole ugly structure, which has been the shame of New York too long, threatens to collapse, carrying the guilty with it to disgrace and ruin.

Abuse of Spiritual Authority

MY KINGDOM is not of this world," said Jesus to Pilate. "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered unto the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence." There were many in those days who believed that the kingdom of heaven was to come through violence. Probably John the Baptist was one who believed it. Some of the disciples who had looked for the setting up of a temporal kingdom were rebuked by the Master for indulging such an expectation. Jesus never advocated or encouraged violence; he never attempted to gra temporal power; he never planned for worl authority, although the tempter seductively offe it. His kingdom was the divine ideal of love God and fellow man stirring in the hearts of m He chose suffering and sacrifice for others rat than personal elevation and self-glorification. kingdom was to be won through the conquest self, through faith in God, through peace and c fidence midst the world's turmoil.

How different from all this is the attitude of Church of Rome! It seeks temporal power, o tion, princely recognition, territory, supre earthly dominion. And it takes up carnal weap to fight for a worldly kingdom, political supremac and wealth.

In September last, Archbishop Quigley, speaki at the annual convention of the German Catho Central Verein in Chicago, said:

I am glad to see that the Central Verein is so thorou organized, for organization is the hope of the Catholic Chu In France and Portugal the Catholic Church was defeated persecuted because the Catholics were not organized. Altho there were thousands of devout and loyal Catholics who w have given their lives if need be for conscience sake, they merely a mob without leadership and were defeated. I want say that when the time comes in this country, as it surely come, and the same forces attack the church here they will find us unprepared or unorganized and they shall not prev We have well ordered and efficient organizations, all at the b and nod of the hierarchy and ready to do what the church thorities tell them to do. With these bodies of loyal Catho ready to step in the breach at any time and present an unbro front to the enemy we may feel secure.

No one can misinterpret language of this so whether it comes from the lips of a Romanist pr ate or a layman. It is in direct contravention the spirit and language of Jesus. It looks not the Kingdom which is "not of this world," but the setting up of a worldly kingdom by violen The Prince of Peace needs no armed hirelings, political advocates, no hierarchy with its organiz forces at his beck and nod. We present the co trast to the open-minded reader, who can draw own conclusions.

Improved Workers' Dwellings

IN MANY of the large European cities, the pro lem of the better housing of the poor is receivi marked attention. It is now nearly twenty yea since London first began to provide improved hom for the working class as a municipal investme It has expended many millions of pounds in t erection of improved dwellings which give comfo and health to their occupants while forming p turesque additions to the suburbs. Paris, with the last few weeks, has authorized its municipali to raise a loan of $4,000,000 for tenements smaller dwellings to be occupied by workers, t ownership vesting in the city. Berlin, too, h made headway in the same direction. Some of o American cities have illustrated the practic value of similar efforts, but their number is st far too few. New York City, which has an annu budget of $190,000,000, has never yet taken up t problem of proper housing for its poor but ind trious working class, although their number legion. What is needed is such a reform in met politan administration as will utilize land in t suburbs for workers' dwellings, instead of coopi them up in a fashion which has given New Yo the unenviable reputation of being the wo crowded city in the world. We should like to s such an experiment set afoot with a good, energe business committee at the head of it. It wou greatly simplify the problem of city congestion a would be an immense advantage in other wa Besides, it would set a needed example to oth municipalities.

General Notes

—DISQUIETING REPORTS came from China during August. Assembly threatened to institute impeachment proceedi against President Yuan Shi Kai unless he gave a satisfactory planation of his execution of two generals affiliated with Sun Sen. A rumor spread that Dr. Sun himself had been assassinat but this was without foundation. Later reports told of a seri mutiny of Mongolian troops in Manchuria.

—AT A RECENT wedding in Philadelphia the bride's fat gave what is probably the most extraordinary wedding ever presented on such an occasion. It was a bridal ca weighing 300 pounds, standing six feet high and artistica decorated. The father and two sons, who are confectione put in this monument of culinary skill 100 pounds of raisi 100 pounds of currants, 360 eggs, 75 pounds of sugar and pounds of butter. Its construction occupied two weeks a it is said that it will last a quarter of a century with crumbling.

The Nicaraguan Revolt

THE president of the republic of Nicaragua received messages from General Zeledon and General Mena, leaders of the insurgents, that unless the government immediately surrendered they would bombard Managua, the capital, within twelve hours. The local diplomatic corps, aroused by the ultimatum of these generals, protested vigorously against the bombardment of the city, and in the name of humanity besought them to desist. The American minister also notified the rebel leaders that they would be held to a strict account for any damage done. The protests were of no avail, and the guns were turned on the city, and for a number of days the besieging army has pressed into the outer precincts of the capital. The deposed Secretary of War, General Mena, brought up some heavy guns from Granada, and they were trained on the houses of the city, and especially on the palace of the president, and on the American legation. Several of the missiles struck within fifty or a hundred feet of the legation. One shell hit the table around which President Diaz and the members of his cabinet were sitting, but no one was hurt. So far the insurgents have been repulsed. There has been considerable loss of life on both sides, and a number of innocent women and children have been killed by the bombardment. One shell hit a hospital and killed and wounded many patients. Our government has been informed that at this time there are one thousand dead bodies unburied on the field about the capital, and that the sanitary conditions are fearful. The government troops number about 3,500, those of the insurgents about 2,500. Our government has ordered the 350 marines who were taken from Panama to Corinto on the collier Justin to go to Managua to protect the lives and property of American residents there. There were at the capital when the siege began 100 United States bluejackets. The department at Washington is likely to use its wisdom or its force to put an end to the useless slaughter in the weaker republic, and to guarantee proper protection to American citizens. The rebellion in Nicaragua, like so many in the Central American republics, answers the description of the prophet:

And the revolters are profound to make slaughter. (Hos. 5: 2.)

A General View of Managua, the Contested Capital of Nicaragua

Types of Nicaraguan Rebel Troops

Drove Rabies from England

THE man who was responsible for the passage of the law driving rabies out of Great Britain arrived at New York the other day. He is the Right Honorable Walter Long, member of Parliament from the Strand Division of London. By his law all dogs were muzzled and a six months' quarantine was put on canines entering the country. The only dogs in the realm exempted under the new law are those owned by the king and queen. The fearful toll of precious lives might be saved in this country if a similar law were enacted. The law should have no exception, for the dogs of the White House might bite as hard and fatally as the cur of the alley. The dog is a beautiful pet and true friend, and that is the greater reason why he should not be allowed to become a murderer. This plea is proper:

Deliver my darling from the power of the dog. (Ps. 22: 20.)

Two Active Women Centenarians

RECENTLY two notable birthday celebrations were held, one of a woman 103, and the other of a woman 104 years old. Mrs. Margaret Van Rensselaer was born in the year that the importation of slaves was abolished in this country, and is consequently 104 years old. She is a resident of Saratoga, N. Y. She entertained a score of relatives who had come to her humble home to help her celebrate her birthday. She declined the invitations to go to live with her relatives, saying she felt more at home in her own cottage, taking care of her flowers and chickens. Her longevity is hereditary. Her mother lived to be 94, and her father was 110 years old when he died. She attributes much of her long life to the careful habits she has observed, illustrated in the fact that for pretty nearly a century she has gone to bed when the chickens have gone to roost, and has gotten up when awakened by the crow of the first rooster. Mrs. Lyman Rogers, of Gay Hill, Conn., celebrated her one hundred and third birthday, many of her friends calling at her home and leaving with her tokens of their love. She is healthy, active, and very highly respected in the community. These centenarians are Christian women, with precious memories of Divine Providence, with present faith and love, and with bright hopes of reunions and of a blessed immortality, and realize the fulfilment of the promise:

With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation. (Ps. 91: 16.)

Tokens of Father's Love

MR. LEON KLEIN, a well-known citizen of Chicago, has a family of two sons and three daughters. They grew up, were well educated and went out into life on their own account. There was singular parental and filial affection. The father gave a dinner party the other day, and the children and grandchildren made up the guests. Instead of the buttonhole bouquet, the little trinket of brass or silver or gold, there was found as a favor at the plate of each of the five children a check for $25,000, making $125,000 in the distribution. The children were not looking for a cent, and the surprise was as great as the delight which found expression in thanks and kisses and tears. The father said: "I feel richer in the love of my children than in my bank balance." Mr. Klein was wise to invest some of his surplus in his children while he was alive to enjoy the giving, and they alive to show the gratitude of receiving, rather than wait for death to make the distribution, which would be cold and might be attended with small gratitude. At that dinner party some one could aptly have made this quotation:

Children's children are the crown of old men; and the glory of children are their fathers. (Prov. 17: 6.)

Civic Honesty

THE commission government of Passaic, N. J., recently introduced a striking novelty in municipal management by practically permitting large property owners to tax themselves. Believing that former assessments had been too low, the Board of Appraisers asked the mill owners to value their own property for taxation. These property owners raised the amounts upon which they were required to pay taxes over five million dollars. In one case the owners of a certain mill declared their willingness to pay taxes on $900,000 more than the city had required of them before. The civic honesty of these manufacturers and their willingness to render to the authorities that which is a just due brings to mind the admonition of the Master:

Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's. (Matt. 22: 21.)

An Alpine Tragedy

IN THE Haute-Garonne, not far from Toulouse, a terrible experience has just befallen a brother and sister named Van Goethen, as the result of which the woman lies dying with a fractured skull, while her brother is in the same hospital overcome by shock and exposure. The brother, who is an engineer in a paper mill, his sister, and a friend, M. Sombardier, son of the director of the mill, started out to climb Mount Sarousse. They made the ascent, but in returning they took the pathway leading to the glacier Domenon. In a dangerous place Mlle. Van Goethen slipped and fell down an ice incline toward the edge of a deep precipice. Her brother, in his attempt to save her, also slipped, but was able to stop himself by seizing hold of a boulder. At the same time he grasped his sister's skirts just as she was sliding over the edge. M. Sombardier crawled down to the boulder and tried to aid the brother to drag the sister back to safety. Their efforts did not avail, for the woman was unconscious and could not lend any help herself. For several minutes the men shouted for help, but in vain. Then Sombardier set off to find rescuers, leaving the brother and sister in their perilous position. It was three hours before the friend reached Revel, and eight hours before the rescuing party had arrived at the glacier. They found the brother still holding on to the body of his sister, from which life was well nigh extinct. The rescue party drew the sister's body over the precipice to safety, and the brother was so nearly dead with agony and exhaustion that he also had to be carried to Revel. The man in his heroism and devotion to his sister in peril is the type of the true, the average brother, who is so careful to protect and save the sister from the physical and moral dangers that beset the pathway of life. This is another one of the long line of Alpine tragedies that have shocked the world. In climbing the steeps of wealth or preferment or ease, or in getting up in the professions or callings of life, or in climbing the mountain of holiness, there are perils, slippery paths, and awful precipices; and there must be caution, and the warm heart and strong arm of a brother to help, and also the heart and the hand that never fail.

There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother. (Prov. 18: 24.)

REST IN THE YOKE*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

"WOE unto thee, Chorazin!" This is a chapter of mingled justice and mercy. It is in Christ's severest sermons that we find his tenderest words. He does not make the mistake we often find among men, exalting justice without mercy, or mercy without justice —this last the besetting fault of our age, which sings of love but belittles law. Law is really but a strong expression of love. Jesus said, Thou shalt love God, thou shalt love man; on these two loves hangs all law. The longest chapter in the Bible (Ps. 119) is a Hallelujah chorus of praise for the excellence of God's law and the happiness of those who love and obey it. As the naturalist grows enthusiastic about some discovered law of plants or stars, the psalmist exults in the beauty and beneficence of God's higher moral law. If we could but catch his spirit our hymn-writers would sing:

Law divine, all law excelling;
Joy of heaven to earth come down.

And law means justice. If our hearts were properly developed we should admire justice no less than mercy, and accept hell no less than heaven. Let us get away from medieval conceptions of punishment and behold it as an integral part of the justice of the great white throne, the supreme court of the universe, where the miscarriages of justice in human courts and in human judgments are overruled and righted. A rascal bribes a jury or wins a judge and robs a poor man, or blackens the character of a woman, and there is no redress in this world. If that is the end of the case we may reasonably be atheists, for a world without justice would be as imperfect as the universe without its central sun.

On this putting of the case, a mountain preacher exclaimed, "Thank God for hell." It was but his quaint way of thanking God for justice. Emerson's apostrophe to justice is timely:

My will fulfilled shall be,
For in daylight or in dark
My thunderbolt has eyes to see
His way home to his mark.

In this chapter, as in others, Christ teaches that those who have indulged their lowest passions in ignorance may not be condemned so severely in the supreme court of perfect justice as those more privileged who refuse to turn from sins less gross. Sodom and Gomorrah by the Dead Sea, Tyre and Sidon on the Mediterranean shore, all notorious for their impurity, were not really so guilty as Capernaum and Chorazin and Bethsaida on the shores of Galilee, that rejected truth not in twilight but at its noon.

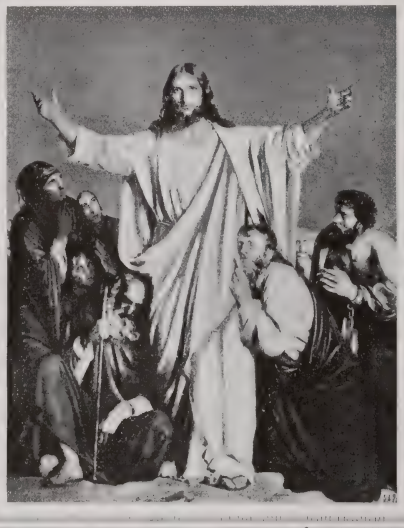
A dying man, remorseful that he had neglected his soul, was reminded by his weeping friends of the repentant dying thief of Calvary whom Christ accepted, but he exclaimed bitterly, "There is no hope in that. He did not have a wife and a pastor urging him for years to turn to God." And he died in despair."

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will rest you." This verse is a broad, landlocked bay where thousands of storm-tossed souls have found peaceful anchorage—probably more than in any other text, save the story of the prodigal, and in John 3: 16, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life."

"Come Unto Me"

St. Augustine tersely says: "In Cicero and Plato and other such writers, I meet with many things acutely said, and things that excite a certain warmth of emotion; but in none of them do I find 'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'" A book might be filled with stories of the heavy laden who have found rest through this promise—many heavy laden with undue toil; many more heavy laden with grief and care; many more heavy laden with sin. Here is one story of a young man that may help others in like case to come for rest.

During a New England camp-meeting an interesting and intelligent looking young man gave the following testimony: "I set out in life, being pretty well-to-do, with a view to enjoying and making the most of it. In a certain sense I succeeded in this respect measurably well. Dipping now into this and now into that kind of business, I made it a point at the same time to dip deep into worldly pleasures. All the way from here to California I acted upon the precepts of the Epicurean: 'Eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die.' At length, however, I was sated. Heartsick and sinsick, disgusted with myself and everybody else, disposed almost to curse the day of my birth, and to wish myself out of the world, I sat down. Like the prodigal son, I came to myself. I had sought satisfaction in the restless whirlpool of pleasure, and had been disappointed; and now, weary and heartsick, I sat down and mournfully asked myself whereunto all this selfish, sinful life was likely to lead. Just at this crisis I seemed to hear a voice sweetly calling, and saying: 'Come unto me, ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' I heeded that call"—and here the tears were coursing freely down the young man's face, and there was scarcely a dry eye in the whole congregation—"I turned to this heavenly Friend. Gladly I gave myself to him in an everlasting covenant; and then, oh how sweetly he saved me! He saves me now. Yea, even now, he gives me his bounty, his love in my heart, and enables me without ceasing to rejoice with a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory."



"Come Unto Me"
(From the painting by Carl Bloch)

Rest in Labor

"Take my yoke upon you . . . and ye shall find rest." The other "rest" promised was rest given; this is "rest" achieved, "rest" we have learned to "find" in the "yoke" by doing our work in the joy of useful service. "Don't take your work as a dose." "It is all in the day's work." These mottoes themselves will help to prevent the chafing in the yoke that makes most of its weariness. Rest is largely due to the attitude of the mind. The soldier wearies of carrying his gun, but the hunter does not. When President Eliot said that workmen should be happy in their work, some workmen sneered, thinking labor a curse. But it is only labor mixed with sin that is a curse, and idleness is also a curse, while labor as a means of serving the world should be a joy. Labor for both man and woman was a part of man's first paradise. One way to make common toil a joy is to teach from childhood that not alone religious work but all useful work in the way of duty is "divine service." The familiar lines should be in every memory:

A servant by this clause
Makes drudgery divine;
Who sweeps a room as for God's cause
Makes that and the action fine.

Less familiar are the lines in which Professor Henry Van Dyke teaches the same truth:

"Joy is a duty," so, with golden lore,
The Hebrew rabbis taught in days of yore,
And happy human hearts heard in their speech
Almost the highest wisdom man can reach:
But one high peak still rises far above,
And there the Master stands whose name is Love,
Saying to those whom weary tasks employ,
"Life is divine when duty is a joy."

Christ's Yoke Compared with Others

When we contrast the simple requirements t Christ puts upon his followers with those of pa religions we see how light his "yoke" and "burd are in contrast. Compare the Pharisaic Sabb for example, with its hundreds of petty rules, v the simplicity of the Christian Sabbath, in wh works of necessity are allowed and acts of me enjoined. Compare the complicated rules of co ing for various castes in India, the mani bondage of the "tabu" in savage islands, the s tortures of Hinduism—compare all these, Roman Catholic ritualism of to-day, with the s plicity of New Testament Christianity. Soon after that entered into rest.

THE CHILDREN

WHAT will become of the children?
Oh, who will gather them in—
In from the highways and byways,
In from the hotbeds of sin?
Who is now seeking the children;
The little ones going astray?
Oh, who will care for the children
Who wander so sadly to-day?

Who if not I who should love Him,
Him who was once but a child,
Him who so tenderly blessed them,
Saying in accents so mild,
"Suffer the children to come unto me"?
Oh, are we keeping away
Any whom we should be sending
Out to their Eden to-day?

What if it costs self-denial?
What if some joys we forego?
We who are living in comfort,
Greeting the blessings that flow
Fresh from the hand of the Master?
Our dear ones have food and to spare,
While, living in vilest surroundings,
Their childhood is cheerless and bare.

Oh, when our lifework is ended,
Joyful our welcome will be,
If on the banks of the river
Little ones there we shall see—
Those whom our own hands have rescued,
Rescued from want and from sin,
Sending them out into sunlight,
Greenest of pastures within.

Out to the Home that is waiting,
Waiting with wide open door,
Waiting to welcome their coming,
The lowly, the suffering, the poor.
Oh, shall we care for the children
Or carelessly live at our ease,
Not hearing the voice that is pleading—
Pleading for "the least of these"?

ACME QUALITY PAINTS are made with care

Mushrooms, which spring up in a night, are like paints that are made in haste. Neither possess staying properties.

The resisting power of Acme Quality Paints, in contrast with that of poorly made paints, may be likened, in great measure, to the difference that exists between flint and soapstone, massive steel and sheet iron, or hardened sinews and weak, flabby muscles.

ACME QUALITY
Paints, Enamels, Stains and Varnishes

will never betray your confidence in them. They withstand heat, cold and hard wear—hold their color, last longest, look the best—are easiest to apply. See that the Acme Quality label is on every can of paint you pay your good money for.

A BABY OF THE FRONTIER

march back to Fort Sullivan to-morrow, but I can't bear to give up; it isn't the habit of the Fourteenth Cavalry. I don't feel that I can keep you here, however, unless you are willing to stay. I will make a return party out of those who want to go back; with the rest, I'll stay in the mountains to the very limit of safety and possibility—and beyond. Who wants to go back?"

The troop he was addressing was that of which old Schmidt was first sergeant.

"Donner und blitzen, colonel! we vill shtay mit you righdt through; ain't it, boys?" he began fiercely.

"Sergeant's right, sor," exclaimed a trooper.

"We'll live a week on them four days' provisions," said another.

"We won't go back without having it out with Dull Knife's braves," cried a third.

"All who vill shtay fall in line und shtandt at attention," growled old Schmidt.

The whole body fell in line instantly. Not a single man even hesitated; the colonel's eyes shone with pleasure.

"You are a body of soldiers and gentlemen," he said gravely, saluting them, "that any man on earth would be honored to command. There are no better men in this army or in any other army, I am sure."

What happened in B troop happened in all the others; there was not a single officer or man who wanted to go back. The whole regiment, five hundred strong, had volunteered.

"I knowed how 'twould be," said Marnett after they had thoroughly talked it over; "them fellers is game an' grit down to their heels. You couldn't freeze it out of 'em at the North Pole."

"What do you advise now?" asked the colonel. "You know we've got to make it this time."

Old Marnett thought deeply; so much depended upon him that he would give no hasty judgment. At last he spoke, carefully weighing his words.

"We've sent out three scoutin' parties an' we've done the northeast pretty well, but we've kind a neglected the southern part, not thinkin' of Dull Knife gittin' down so near the settlements. Mebbe he's counted on that; mebbe he's down in there somewheres waitin' for the spring to break up the snow an' give him a chance to git north an' join the Sioux in the open country, where there's good buffaler huntin' still. Let's try to the south'ard."

"Your advice is good," said Compton. "I think I will send out three different parties to scout south; you will take one, Grouard another, and—"

"Let me have the third," said Dexter. "You know I know this game about as well as anybody, except yourself and—"

"Good!" answered the colonel. "We will detail a lieutenant and twenty men to go with each leader. Take the best men and the best horses in the regiment. We will give you three days; at the end of that time you must be back. That's the limit of our endurance. Meanwhile I'll try to organize hunting parties to see if we can't get some game to eke out our rations."

"I've got a hunch," said Marnett, "that we are goin' to git him this time."

The little colloquy was broken by a rifle shot from the farthest sentry to the westward, who was stationed where he could command a view of the pass, through which raced a little brook so furiously that even the intensest cold had not yet frozen it from bank to bank. It was quite dark by this time, and Colonel Compton with the other officers of the staff hurried to the picket line. A short distance away, seen dimly in the dusk and falling snow, stood a solitary Indian, wrapped in a blanket, an eagle feather rising from his head.

"What is it?" asked the colonel of the officer of the guard.

"There's an Indian out there, sir," answered Lieutenant Alderdice. "He seems to want to speak to us, but I have ordered him to stay where he was, not to make a move under pain of death. He has been hallooing at us—there he goes again."

There was a lull in the wind at the time, and for the first time since he had hailed the voice of the Indian was plainly audible.

"For God's sake," came faintly, "don't shoot. I'm a white man."

"That's no Indian," said Compton. "I seem to know that voice."

"And I," exclaimed Dexter.

"That will be Meagher," cried Calmore.

The colonel darted past the sentinel and pushed through the snow, with Calmore following.

"Keep him covered," ordered Dexter, who remained with the officer of the guard, "and if it should prove to be an Indian and there is any treachery give him a bullet at the first move."

But there was no treachery. The Indian dropped his blanket as the colonel drew near and those who covered him saw him salute and the next instant the colonel had him by the hand shaking it furiously.

"Meagher!" he cried; "is it you?"

"It is, sor."

"And Ethel?"

"Safe an' well, sor, at this minute."

"Where is she?"

"As near as I can judge, sor, she's about fifteen miles away in Dull Knife's village."

"Not up this cañon?" asked the colonel. "We scouted that carefully when we first came."

"You missed the little cañon that leads off from it, sor, about eight miles up an' about six into the heart of the mountains. Dull Knife is there."

"Can you lead us to the spot?"

"I am afraid not, sor; I have got to be back before morning. They don't quite trust me yet; I'm supposed to be on a hunt, an' if I'm not there in the morning, they might do some harrum to the child."

"Can't you guide us there?"

"I could, sor, but I'd better not."

"Why not?"

"Well, you see, sor, I can tell you the way so that you can find it yourselves. I know a trail over the range an' I can cut across the country an' get to the camp long before you do. I'd better be there when you attack, for there's no tellin' what they might do to the child if they get a chance when the troops burst in on them."

"How many are there?"

"Over six hundred, sor."

"Braves?"

"Yes, sor, an' women an' children besides. Dull Knife has found a regular hole in the wall, a pocket where they are encamped; there is only one way in an' another way out."

"Thank God, she is alive. Have they mistreated her?"

"No, sor, she is rather a pet of the chief; he's dressed her out in buckskin an' even had a war bonnet made for her."

"Is she well?"

"Well an' happy as she can be, save for wantin' her mother, sor."

"How did you escape?"

"You see, sor, the lasht man that fired at me as I run across the meadow came near to gettin' me. As it happened I shtumbled an' fell jist as he pulled the trigger; the bullet cut across the back of me skull an' stunned me."

"It was a lucky stumble," said the colonel; "that was Marnett."

"Glory be!" cried Danny.

"Well, I haven't time to hear more of your story now, Meagher; you say you will go back over the mountains?"

"Yes, sor, 'tis only about ten miles that way. If you could shpare me a squad of men that can climb like goats, I'll take them back with me an' they will come in handy. I'll put them on the hill while I go down into the valley to my tepee."

"You shall have them," said the colonel; "let us go back now."

When the three men reached the camp they were greeted with a ringing outburst of cheers; although Danny was painted like an Indian and dressed as one, his comrades recognized him.

"Men," said the colonel, "Meagher has given us the location of the Indian camp. We are going up the cañon to-night; we will hit them in the morning. Meagher wants some men who can climb like goats and who can stand a hard march to go with him to take a position on the hills overlooking the camp. Who will volunteer?"

"I for one," cried Hadden, "my horses are dead beat now, and my whole troop will go afoot if you will let us."

"Good," said Compton. "Let every man of the troop that wants to go with you, Mr. Hadden. The rest of you saddle up and get ready to move out. We'll take every man jack that can go, leaving the sick and the wagon train with the teamsters. The chief teamster can command the camp. We ought to strike the hostiles by morning."

"'Tain't up the cañon here, is it?" asked Marnett.

"No," answered Danny, "after you have gone about eight miles up there's a narrow little rift in the mountains."

"I've seen it," said Marnett; "I didn't know it led anywhere."

"Well, it does," said Danny. "If you follow that cañon for a mile, you come to a broader pass, an' if you follow that for five miles more over the range you come to one of them holes, pockets that is, as level as a floor, and big enough for a brigade camp. There ain't nobody knows of it except the Cheyennes. Once there an' you've got 'em. Now I'd better go, with the colonel's permission, sor."

"You have it," answered Compton.

"All right, sor," said Meagher; "please may I ask the colonel one question before I go?"

"A dozen if you want," answered Compton.

"How's Molly, sor?"

"Well, I believe. She's back at the fort with Mrs. Compton and the rest, praying every hour on her knees for you and our success."

"Thank you, sor. After I have served my term for my neglected juty," said Danny, "if I'm not shot, I'll ask the colonel's permission to marry her."

"You have it now," returned the colonel.

"Thank you again, sor," said Danny gratefully, beaming on his commander.

"Good-by," said Compton, extending his hand. Meagher shook it awkwardly, saluted, and turned away, followed by Hadden.

It was quite dark now, and the men filed by, in the light snow that was falling, like gray ghosts. In a minute the line halted, and Danny turned and came back.

"If you please, sor, I'll be wearing a white buffalo robe when the ould Fourteenth reaches the camp, that belongs to Dull Knife. It's the only one in the camp, but I can git it. Will you kindly pass the word among the boys not to fire at any one wearing a white buffalo robe? I'm apt to be in the thick of it with the little girl; 'tis not so much for meself I'm caring."

"Good. We will watch out for you, Meagher," said the colonel.

"Thank you, sor." And he was gone again, and in less than a minute Hadden and his troop had disappeared.

It took ten minutes perhaps for the rest of the regiment to get in line and move out. The sick, the frozen, the snowblind and the invalids were left behind with the wagon train, all cursing the hard fate that deprived them of the chance of participating in this desperate adventure. With Compton and Marnett at their head, the troops saddled and started up the trail in a column of fours. They went slowly, but they plunged desperately on, in the drifting snow and the bitter night.

A QUESTION FOR PROHIBITIONISTS

REV. SILAS C. SWALLOW, former presidential candidate of the National Prohibition Party, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:

"I notice in your July 31 report of the proceedings of the Prohibition National Convention held in Atlantic City, July 12, you have this statement, viz.:

"Then came the elimination of the plank declaring for a separation of state and church, and declaring against the use of public moneys for sectarian schools and churches. Dr. Silas C. Swallow of Pennsylvania sought also to add a declaration against the wearing of clerical garb in schools. Father George Zurcher of Buffalo, a Catholic priest and delegate, declared this would be interpreted as an affront to Catholics. After much discussion the plank was voted down.

"This statement by your reporter is quite misleading, and should not go uncorrected. Here are the facts: After the submission of the report of the committee on platform, I offered the following:

"We are opposed to the appropriation of public moneys to sectarian churches and schools; also to the wearing of sectarian garb by teachers of public schools. We demand that the separation of church and state be perpetual.

"Rev. George Zurcher made a speech against it. A delegate, claiming to come from the District of Columbia, by the name of O. Brian, moved to lay the plank on the table. On a rising count vote the chairman announced that it was laid on the table, naming the number for and against it. Many delegates afterward averred that the motion to lay on the table was lost and the secretaries and chairman by an inadvertence had between them reversed the vote in making the announcement. The next day I eliminated the 'garb' part of the plank, and presented it again under a 'question of privilege.' The chairman, Dr. Charles H. Mead, of New York, decided it out of order under a question of privilege, and said it could come up at another time, but in the hurry and flurry of nominating candidates, and the hurry to adjourn for the accommodation of delegates anxious to start for home, the subject was dropped. It goes without saying that the Prohibition Party does not now, never did, and never will stand for a union of church and state, nor for the appropriation of public moneys for sectarian purposes. It is unfortunate for our cause that the matter was left in the contradictory condition which it now occupies in the public mind."

CHRISTIAN HERALD JUST SPLENDID

I think THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for 1912 is just splendid. I have taken this paper since 1890, and surely you have made wonderful progress in every way. The front cover pictures are so much better than at any time during the last three or four years. Eugene Thwing's articles are splendid productions, as well as the notes on the Sunday School Lessons by Dr. and Mrs. Crafts. We always enjoy reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and wish you continued success. L. W. KASTRUP.

"Two Fall Dresses for My Daughters"

"Last spring I wrote you about the trouble I had because I tried to dye a blue woolen skirt and some linen waists in the same dye bath. Thanks to your letter of advice, I have had splendid success since then. Now I want to show you the pictures of the two fall dresses for my daughters. I made those for Edna and Grace. I cut these from the ——— Magazine, bought the patterns for each, and made Grace's, my youngest daughter; from an old white serge and Edna's from a pink voile party dress of my own. Grace's I dyed navy blue and trimmed it with dark red; Edna's I dyed a tan and used white ruching for the collar and cuffs. We are all delighted with them. They look even prettier than the pictures and now we understand Diamond Dyes." Mrs. R. B. Kendrick,
North Broad St., Philadelphia

Learn the economy—the fascination—the magic of changing colors with Diamond Dyes.

Diamond Dyes

There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for wool or silk, the other for Cotton, Linen or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk now come in Blue envelopes. And, as heretofore, those for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods are in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics, and vegetable fibre fabrics.

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80% Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on Every fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in co'oring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

Diamond Dyes are sold at the uniform price of 10c per package

Frying in Warm Weather

Dainty, delicious and wholesome foods

ALL during the warmer months, it is especially important that your foods be prepared in as dainty, delicate and wholesome a way as possible.

That way is with

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening For Cake Making

Crisco gives up its heat much more readily than lard, cooking the food more quickly. The crust therefore is thin and crisp; the inside dry and free from excessive grease and with the full food flavor.

The Crisco absorbed does not affect the wholesomeness, as the same amount of lard would, because Crisco is purely vegetable and entirely healthful.

In addition to improving the food, Crisco makes it easier for the cook. It does not smoke. It does not smell. It is no hardship to stay in the kitchen on a warm day when Crisco does the frying.

Get a package today and try it for frying doughnuts or any other food. You will be sorry that you did not use it all through the summer.

This Cook Book

Gives some fine doughnut recipes and 100 others, for fried dishes, pastry and cake which are simply delicious when made with Crisco. Send for a copy today.

Questions and Answers

Subscriber, Lincoln, Neb. Is it against the rules of the Catholic Church for a Catholic man to marry a Protestant woman or vice versa?

By the Papal decree Ne Temere (which is fully explained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 21, p. 816) such marriages, unless permitted by a special "dispensation" from Rome, are regarded as "no marriages" and the children as illegitimate.

W. G. M., Lancaster, Pa. Please give the marriage age in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland and Delaware.

In Delaware the man's age is eighteen, the woman's sixteen. In New York State, the man's eighteen, the woman's not specified. In Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Maryland, the man must be twenty-one and the woman eighteen.

C. W. S., Lincoln Heights, O. Christ himself tells us that "greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend." This is surely the highest standard of loving sacrifice. Many thousands have followed this example in yielding up their lives for their faith in Christ. The great army of martyrs is the best illustration of that love which holds life as a little thing in comparison with fidelity to the faith. Those who truly follow Christ do not value their own comfort or their worldly interests, and instances are not wanting even in our own time where devoted men and women have died at their post of duty for his sake rather than abandon his service. The whole history of modern missions is full of such instances, showing that the martyr spirit has not died out.

W. T., Lucerne, Mo. Can a person be a true Christian and not pray?

There may be such a one, but we sincerely doubt it. Prayer is the most potent weapon in the Christian's armory. By keeping in constant communion with God, faith is renewed and life takes on a higher purpose and a nobler direction. We cannot conceive of any one who, professing to be a Christian, can read the teachings of Jesus in the Gospels and yet live without prayer. "Pray without ceasing" is the admonition which should be practically followed.

C. C. A., Saratoga, Wyoming. 1. Where does the soul dwell after death until the Judgment Day? 2. Why is the rich man mentioned in Luke 16: 19-30, so often spoken of as Dives when there is no such name given him in the Bible?

1. Many books have been written concerning the state of the soul between death and the resurrection. The Catholics have the doctrine of purgatory, but the early Christians held no such belief. They believed that there is a judgment immediately after death and a final judgment later, and that in the intermediate state (not "place") every believer's soul would find a foretaste of the greater joys to come. Some non-Catholic authorities have held that the soul after leaving the body remains inert until the resurrection. The best authorities, however, hold that it retains its active power, and is assigned to a condition which is suited to its degree of development until the final change. Jesus promised the repentant thief: "To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise" (Luke 23: 43). See also II. Cor. 12: 4: II. Cor. 5: 6-8. 2. Dives is the Latin word for "rich," and has been applied as a symbolic name to the rich man of this parable. There is an old tradition that his real name was Dobruk.

J. R. G., Columbia, Pa. Will you suggest some way to increase the membership of our Men's Brotherhood?

As a first principle it is well to remember that men will be more likely to meet together if they are given something to do than if they are invited to come simply to be amused. The men's club in a church ought to be made to feel that it has some definite task to accomplish and exists for work rather than amusement. The very best thing would be to get the men intensely interested in leading others to Christ. Many brotherhoods, such as that of St. Andrew and of Andrew and Philip, make this their special work. Others pledge their members to try to bring one man each to church every Sunday. Bands of lay evangelistic workers used to be more common than now, but the idea is sensible and excellent. In almost any evangelical church a few men could be found who could do good evangelistic work; the other men would be willing to accompany them to help in the singing and would gradually get into the work of exhortation. The "Ushers' Club" of Central M. E. Church, Frankford, Pa., has quite a reputation in and around Philadelphia, and is in demand to conduct church services in this way. The club is so large that details of men are assigned to do duty as ushers, while another group goes to lead the services at some church to which they are invited. The experiment of asking the men of a church to meet together for prayer would probably be more successful than might be thought. Men feel the need of deep and serious things, and could be made to realize that prayer is the highest task in which a human being can engage. Then there are countless tasks for neighborhood and civic betterment in which churchmen should be taking the lead. Whatever efforts are made to interest men in a social way should be dignified, and in keeping with church ideals. Courses of lectures, debates, study of current events, economic and political problems, all these can be made helpful and attractive.

Mrs. T. L. T., New York City. Did not Christ preach his first sermon from a text?

The address referred to in Luke 4: 16-19 was made at the opening of his public ministry. He chose a passage from Isaiah's prophecies (49th chapter) announcing the sublime object of his holy mission, his divine character and his special preparation for it. It was his first public deliverance in a prophetic capacity and described the "Servant of the Lord," despised of men, but before whom kings and princes were to worship. Nothing could have been more applicable than this for such an auspicious occasion.

D. R. E., North Lewisburg, O. If France and other European countries, where the populace is overwhelmingly Catholic, can turn down the influence of the Church of Rome and make those countries democratic, what might we reasonably expect American Catholics would do if, by some chance, this country should be dominated by the Pope? I am confident, from my intimate acquaintance among them, that they would spring with courage and determination instantly to the front and demand at once that the country be returned to a democracy.

This suggestion is a very misleading one, although doubtless put forward in all frankness by our correspondent. In the case of France and other European countries, which the Catholics formerly dominated, it was not until the last degree of suffering from such domination had been reached that the people in self-protection were driven to cast off the selfish and irksome yoke of the Church of Rome. If D. R. E. will study history carefully, and will especially study the present situation in Portugal, where the new republic is struggling for its life against a revolution fomented wholly by Catholic influence, and Belgium, where the people are conducting a great battle to save their liberties and to prevent the schools, the public revenues and the political representation of the country from being absorbed, he will realize what a fearful thing it is for a country to have passed under the power of Rome and how hard it is to shake off the papal grip. There are some very worthy people who write us advising toleration. The American people are distinctly tolerant of all religions, but they rightly take the ground that no attempt by any religion is to be tolerated, which has for its object interference with the state and the liberties and privileges of the citizen.

W. H. B., Medford, Mass. There have been many varied interpretations of Revelation. The passage to which you refer (in chapter 20) relates to the period immediately preceding the millennium; but it is beyond man's power to reckon the time when these things shall be. It is not possible, in a human sense, to attain to perfection, but God has revealed to us through his Son his plan of reconciliation for the repentant sinner, whereby his sins may be forgiven and no longer imputed to him. There is much in Revelation that is figurative or metaphorical and many things that have puzzled the wisest, but of this we may be assured: That God's mercy is boundless; that his forgiveness through the atonement extends to all who will accept and that no one who comes to him truly repentant will be cast out. Being at liberty to choose of their own free will between good and evil, forgiveness or condemnation, they cannot charge God with the result of their own sins or for their failure to seek the pardon and mercy he so fully offers.

J. J., Odessa, Wash. What is the highest tariff? Mention a few articles on which it is placed.

Under the Payne-Aldrich Act of 1909 the tariff on some commodities was reduced, on others increased, while some, hitherto taxed, were put on the free list. It is hard to say what is the highest tariff as there are so many articles steeply rated. Probably cigars and cigarettes are heaviest, the tax being $4.50 per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem. Spirits, such as brandy, gin, whisky, come high at $2.60 a proof gallon. Crude opium has to pay $1.50 per pound. Woolen goods are far up in the scale, blankets being assessed at from 22 cents a pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem to 44 cents a pound and 50 per cent. ad valorem.

A. B., Pittsfield, Mass. Please explain the dog days; when do they occur?

The dog days are the hottest part of the year, a period which the ancients associated with the heliacal rising of Sirius, the Dog Star; that is, when Sirius and our own sun crossed the meridian at the same time in midsummer. The great heat was supposed to extend from twenty days before the rising of Sirius until twenty s after, hence the total dog days were forty. Romans dated the period from July 3 to gust 11. The dog days can be no longer ntified with the rising of Sirius owing to effects of precession, the star rising later ery year; in time Sirius will cross the meri- n in midwinter. At present the dog days popularly supposed to extend from July 15 August 15, but are not associated with the r. This is the hottest and most unpleasant iod in our latitude. Sirius, the Dog Star, be easily recognized, as he is five times ghter than any other star in our firmament. gives out thirty times more light and heat n our own sun, but is 555,000 times farther ay. He now rises about 16½ degrees south ue east and in our latitude is with us from ober to May. In midwinter he is in full w for ten hours every clear night.

P. V., Trenton, N. J. Is there any Scripture to substantiate the fact that God has a purpose to carry out in each of his children's lives?

es, there are many passages bearing on subject. The divine purpose in the lives each of us is clearly set forth in God's ealed Word. It is that we should live an, upright, holy, useful lives, obeying God's s, trusting in his word, accepting his Son our Saviour and invoking divine strength guide and protect us through life; that we uld dwell at peace with all men, love one other, be just, generous and charitable, help needy, sympathize with the suffering and, far as lies in us, follow Christ's example in daily acts and keep close in touch with him ough prayer; that we should forsake not assembling of ourselves for worship and leavor to do our whole duty to our friends, neighbors, and for the advancement of d's kingdom on earth.

H. K., Pasadena, Calif. Does a mother use good judgment and display wisdom who reads story books of all kinds to her daughter, who is just six years old and of a nervous temperament? The reading is usually done in the afternoon for an hour or more; then again in the evening, when the child is put into her bed at seven o'clock, the reading is resumed and continued until the child falls asleep.

Children usually delight in stories, but in e case you mention, the mother may be erstimulating the imagination of a nervous ild. Judgment should be used in the choice books for children. To pack their young nds with stories at so early an age would many cases be unwise, if not positively jurious. Certainly, to do so just before the ild's time to retire would be inadvisable, nce it would be apt to make the young mind bnormally active at a time when it should quiet and undisturbed.

As to a Wife's Privileges

L. J., New York (in THE MAIL-BAG of July), asked: "What are the privileges of a ife? Has she no privileges at all, or is she mply to be a slave, or one under bondage to er husband? I know a wife who never gets church and her husband (a farmer) thinks e should never go anywhere unless with him. e does not wish her to see or associate with y but himself." Several readers have undertaken to answer. Mrs. S. G. H., Durand, L, writes: "It is her privilege to walk by the de of her husband as his equal, not as his aler, but as his complement; and we think e jurisdiction of his authority extends only ver instances of deviation from rectitude. I ould suggest that the cardinal virtues to be xercised on the part of the wife (who has such hard part to play) would be, trust in God r enlightened judgment, fearless action acording to that judgment, cheerfulness and atience. I cannot say what her outward acts hould be, but am confident that the inward cts or virtues above referred to will work like charm."

Mary S. R., Port Byron, N. Y., writes on the ame topic: "The privileges of a wife should nclude the carrying out of her own ideas of appiness and usefulness in her own way, proiding, of course, that in so doing she does not isturb the harmony of the home. As she is he undisputed custodian of harmony among er household, she will constantly have deep roblems to consider, most of which must be olved by elimination. The poor man mentioned has probably been worried to distraction over the hard task which bows down more han half the human race—that of 'making oth ends meet.' It is certainly a good sign hat he wishes to go with his wife and to have er go with him. This close companionship hould have good results, as it gives a great pportunity for the wife to soften his nature y her gentleness and patience. Love never ails. It has the divine guarantee. Let the wife think less of her own crosses and try more o ease those he has to bear. Even if he is all o blame (which is quite unlikely), the practice on the wife's part of lovingkindness and forgiveness will sweeten both their lives and do more than anything else could possibly do to make the husband see the error of his ways. When women begin to inquire seriously into their 'privileges,' they are appalled at the scope of them and fearful lest they may not prove equal to their opportunities."

Another reader, J. B. W., Des Moines, Ia., writes: "The privileges of a wife should include: (1) A regular liberal financial budget for household needs; (2) A personal budget (or allowance) which represents her share of the labor of the domestic partnership and which should be proportionate to the united income, enabling her to have entire freedom of action in church money, wardrobe, charities, gifts, etc. (3) She should have also full freedom of action regarding church attendance and a reasonable latitude as to social gatherings, etc. (4) She is entitled to the practical control of the management of the household, as to servants, meals, and general arrangements, assuming that she is capable, of course. With these conditions and with mutual love with respect for each other's opinions and forbearance with each other's shortcomings there should be no serious discord."

J. U. X., Parkland, Wash., writes: "As to 'privileges of a wife,' I would ask: 'What privileges do I demand?' Then let me concede her the same right. The man is the head, not the master of a slave. 'All of you be subject one to another' (I. Pet. 5: 5). That husband might profitably read Col. 3: 19; especially I. Pet. 3: 7. But such men are found. I know of one so jealous of his wife that when he went out plowing he placed her in the middle of the field he was plowing around, so that no one should see her and she see no one. Whether he even tied her, I am not sure. Such men ought to be treated likewise."

Reader, Greenup, Ill. Miss Mary E. Gaines, Largo, N. M., would be glad to communicate with you concerning the several hundreds of magazines you have on hand.

Reader, Muscatine, Ia. The presumption is that John the Baptist was baptized by some of his own disciples, as it was customary for them to baptize one another. John's baptism has not the character of an immediate, but rather of a preparatory consecration.

A Subscriber, Richmond, O. Under the circumstances stated in your inquiry, the daughter's husband has no interest in the property of his wife, since under the terms of her father's will, she took only a life interest, and the grandson on her death would be entitled to the property.

J. M. S., Winters, Calif. The Bibles sent abroad by the American Bible Society are sold in some cases, but for the most part distributed free. The society is supported by contributions at home. N. B. B., Clifton, N. J. While from your point of view you were no doubt justified in your judgment of the case, it is quite a different matter with a pastor who has to defer to the wishes of others in certain matters. We cannot judge the pastor, not knowing how he would have acted had he been free to follow his own inclinations.

Ada S., Paterson, N. J. The names of the twenty rulers of Israel were Jeroboam, Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Tibni, Omri, Ahab, Ahaziah, Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz, Jehoash, Jeroboam II., Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, Pekah, and Hoshea. You will find them mentioned in the historical books of Kings and Chronicles.

The "Guardians of Liberty"

A NUMBER of letters have been received from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD inquiring with regard to the Guardians of Liberty. An article fully describing the high patriotic character of the organization and the distinguished standing of its founders appeared in this journal on June 26. The membership of the organization is rapidly increasing. All who desire to know more about it can address Hon. Charles D. Haines, 50 West Twenty-fourth Street, New York City, who will receive applications and issue membership certificates, costing $1 each. All moneys received from this source are used for membership propaganda. Any American of either sex who stands for religious liberty and the preservation of the Constitution is eligible to membership. New members are organized in "Courts," supplied with working material and brought into active and sympathetic relationship with the main organization in all its activities.

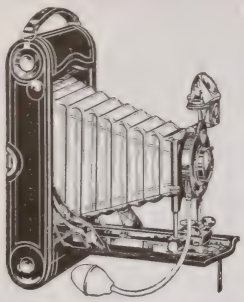
If it isn't an Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.



The quality of your picture depends as much on the simplicity of your camera as upon the quality of its lens and shutter and mechanism.

KODAKS

combine simplicity with quality. There are no annoying details in the operation of the Kodak. Kodaks bear the same relation to a plate camera that the automatic gun bears to your grandfathers muzzle loader. Kodaks are simple, efficient, reliable. They are designed by the most experienced camera makers in the world, are made in the largest and best equipped camera factory in the world, are fitted with lenses of the highest type, each one individually tested both by the lens maker and by our own testers. Kodaks are made by men with whom honest workmanship has become a habit.

There's no dark-room in the Kodak system of picture making. The Kodak is complete ready to use with daylight loading film cartridges—there's no extra investment in plate holders as in the case of a plate camera.

The Catholic Church in Peru

"THE Roman Catholic Church has been supreme in Peru during more than three hundred years, yet is it not generally admitted that in no region of the earth has Christianity sunk to a more degraded condition than in some of the South American republics? The attention of the world was drawn nearly fifty years ago to the religious conditions prevailing in Santiago, one of the principal towns of Chile, where on December 18, 1863, two thousand human beings were burned to death in the 'Church of the Company.' It is worth while to turn back to the leading articles and correspondence published in the London Times at that period. A priest, Ugarte, had made himself a devotee of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. According to the narrative in the Times,

"he worked his way down to such a depth of superstition that one of his least extravagances was the invention of a celestial post office trick, by which the 'Daughters of Mary' might correspond with the Virgin in writing. At the entrance of the temple the Virgin's letter-box was constantly open, and there persons of a robust faith deposited in sealed letters their wishes and their prayers. Every Wednesday that letter-box for eternity was placed before the high altar, and Ugarte, who acted as postman between the Mother of God and her Daughters, exhibited to the Divinity those offerings, of course keeping that singular correspondence to himself. The same mountebank got up a religious raffle for the favor of the Virgin. . . . The old times of pagan idolatry had been resuscitated in this center of exaggerated Catholicism.

"The 'Church of the Company' was blazing with thousands of lights on the night of the catastrophe, and when fire broke out the artificial garlands and hangings were instantly aflame. In a leading article the Times spoke bluntly of 'the clerical mountebanks of Santiago.' A lurid light was thrown at that time on the methods of South American ecclesiastics. Has the spirit of Ugarte been wholly exorcised during the past half century?"

The foregoing is from the British Weekly of August 8. It is now proposed to remedy the disgraceful conditions of native servitude and cruel inhumanity in Peru by entrusting the task of reformation to a Roman Catholic mission. People may well ask how a church which so neglected its moral and spiritual responsibilities during three hundred years, can now be expected to reform conditions to which its long-continued neglect has given assent. What Peru really needs is the Gospel and a rigid enforcement of humane and just laws. It is worse than ridiculous to consign its people to the tender mercies of the same church which has been so largely responsible for its miseries in the past.

Priests Leading Portugal's Revolution

AFTER a period of comparative peace, the young Portuguese Republic finds itself engaged in a life and death struggle for existence. When the rebellion broke out several months ago, it was an open secret that the entire movement was fostered and financed by Romanists. Proof of this fact is now forthcoming. The republican authorities have not been caught napping. To prevent the young government from being wrecked by the plotters, they have inaugurated a counter-movement. A Lisbon despatch, dated August 13, gave the following description of the present situation:

The government is making wholesale war on priests, scores of whom are being put in prison daily on the accusation of complicity in monarchist plots. The prisons are so overcrowded that convents and monasteries are being turned into State penitentiaries. The government is daily discovering fresh monarchist plots. It is estimated now that 400 priests and 100 army officers are in prison. After the discovery of the monarchist plot at Braga a band of 150 Royalists, including twenty-six priests, fled to the woods. They were pursued by soldiers, overtaken and after a desperate resistance surrendered, having lost many, killed and wounded. The government declares now that the Catholic clergy in Portugal are mainly responsible for the Royalist movement, and intimates that no mercy will be shown to priests suspected of tendencies hostile to the government. Death or deportation will be the fate of all recalcitrant clerics. All the leading Portuguese Royalists are emigrating to Brazil, and Rio Janeiro is now the headquarters of the revolutionary movement.

A later despatch from Lisbon, dated August 18, says:

The Patriarch of Lisbon is giving marked publicity to a message he has received bearing the signatures of Cardinal Farley, Archbishop of New York, and Cardinal O'Connell, Archbishop of Boston. The American cardinals in the message regret the persistent attacks directed toward Catholics in Portugal, and hope for the speedy return of liberty of conscience.

MODEL AEROPLANES

HOW TO BUILD PAPER WINGS AND CONSTRUCT PROPELLERS

BY FRANCIS A. COLLINS

THERE is much to be learned about model aeroplanes by practicing with gliders, and a great deal of fun in learning it. The glider should be held above one's head, grasped somewhere near the point at which it balances, and thrown forward and a trifle upward. You will learn more about stability in this actual practice than by reading all the books of rules and theories. The trick is to have your model fly, or, rather, glide on a perfectly even keel, neither rolling or pitching in its flight.

"IT WILL SAIL HALF A MILE"

Some amateur model builders get better results with wings built up of wooden strips and covered with cloth or muslin. If you prefer these planes they will be found simple to construct and very interesting work besides. Select a stick of some light straight-grained wood, measuring one-eighth or one-quarter of an inch square, and cut off a piece the width of your plane. For the cross pieces of the frame use a thin strip, just heavy enough to keep from bending. Cut off three lengths the width of your larger planes, and two the width of the smaller plane. These should be fastened at right angles to the main sticks by gluing and tying them firmly in position. Now take a piece of wire or a thin strip of bamboo and run it around the edges, tying it and gluing it to the cross pieces. The ends should be rounded. The frame may then be covered with paper or some thin, strong cloth. A thin, tough paper is better. Should the paper be torn, as it probably will be, it is easy to repair the damage by pasting a piece of paper over the broken part.

The propellers should be five inches in length. It is possible to buy propellers ready for use, or the propeller blanks from which you can carve the blades. If you cannot obtain these, prepare propeller blanks by cutting a block of wood five inches in length, one inch wide, and three-quarters of an inch deep. Round off the ends and whittle away the sides, beginning with the edges, until you have two thin blades. Sandpaper and varnish all the surfaces. To mount the propellers, pass a stiff wire through the exact center and clinch the end on the opposite side. Now drill two holes through the base stick of the fusilarge just large enough for the axles to pass through, and after placing the propellers in position, turn the end into a hook. A similar hook should then be fastened to the extreme end of the fusilarge, directly on a line with the propellers. Between these hooks now string half a dozen strands of rubber about one-eighth of an inch square. Such rubber can be bought at the aeronautical supply houses for about one cent a foot. To wind up the motor for a flight, turn the propellers in opposite directions until a double row of knots has been formed. The propellers must, of course, be turned in opposite directions. When your propellers are wound up, launch your model as though it were a glider.

GOOD-MORNING SONG

All things bright and beautiful,
All creatures great and small,
All things wise and wonderful,

And lips that we might tell
How great is God Almighty,
Who has made all things well.

Nothing Leaks Except Fountain Pens

How to Stop It:

IF they can make great steam boilers, vast water supply systems and pipelines for oil that won't leak, why can't they make fountain pens that won't leak?

They can. George S. Parker, of Janesville, Wisconsin, makes them.

Mr. Parker found out that ink always stays in the feed tube of an ordinary fountain pen, even when point up in your pocket. It won't all run down.

The air in the pen gets warm from your body and expands—expands up through the inky feed tube. It blows the ink up with it—up and out all over the writing end of the pen, to smear your fingers when you remove cap to write.

"If I can get that ink down out of the feed tube, my pen won't leak," said Mr. Parker.

So he curved his feed tube to touch the barrel. That touch creates Capillary Attraction. And Capillary Attraction sucks the ink down out of the feed tube before the expanding air ascends. Thus, nothing but air smears the end of a Parker Pen.

The curved feed tube is called the Lucky Curve. Capillary Attraction is the force in Nature that makes a blotter suck ink.

Parker Pens write fine—never hitching, skipping, blotting. The 14k gold pens are pointed with hardest Iridium. Parker Spear Head Ink Controller makes ink flow velvety.

Standard style Parker Lucky Curve Pens $1.50 to $250.00 according to size and ornamentation.

New Parker Jack Knife Safety Pen won't leak even if carried upside down in trousers pocket. Pen knife size for lady's purse. Prices $2.50 up.

New Parker Disappearing Clip grips like mad, but disappears peaceably when you remove cap to write.

If you do not find Parker Pens at your dealer's, send us his name and we'll send you complete catalog to order from direct.

Sold on trial. If any Parker Pen should leak or shouldn't be as represented, return it within 10 days of purchase. We protect dealers from loss.

Tomorrow is a bad day. Today is the day.

WHAT OTHERS SAY

COMMENT OF THE PRESS ON TOPICS OF THE DAY

The Ambition of Rome

IN AMERICA just now we are facing many peculiarly perplexing questions, and Rome—the same Rome that wanted to burn Martin Luther—is an element in the situation. It would be well, therefore, if every citizen were informed as to the mind and might of Rome. Although freed from the outward scandals and corruptions of Luther's times, and curbed by the larger knowledge of our day, at heart it is the same Rome that Martin Luther faced with such uncompromising courage and audacity. It craves and demands mastery—absolute, unquestioned mastery. With its power and prestige tottering in the Old World, it is making a bold stand here in America. Its powerful hierarchy is demanding special recognition and special privileges, in defiance of American ideals and constitutional restrictions. We shall have to meet this demand. It is useless to try to evade it. In the light of the past, it is clear that we cannot hope to escape it. And in this inevitable contest one most effective weapon is enlightenment. A knowledge of what Rome has been helps us to a knowledge of what Rome would be. We make no call for proscription, but we do call for watchfulness and vigilance to keep our institutions true to American ideals.—From the Examiner (Baptist), New York.

Caution in the Streets

IT IS an excellent idea of the American Museum of Safety to hold classes for the instruction of children in carefulness in the streets. If rules for the safety of pedestrians, such as those the museum suggests, could be so impressed upon the minds of the people that their observance would be second nature many lives would be saved.

If people always looked on leaving a car and passing behind it to see whether another car was coming in the opposite direction before stepping on the other track, if they were careful to see whether automobiles were approaching before dismounting from cars, if they would always look about themselves before crossing streets, and if they would abandon the habit of crossing streets anywhere instead of at the regular crossings, there would be fewer accidents.

Moreover, a public which was careful in crossing streets, and thus did its part to avoid accidents, would probably become insistent that vehicular traffic should show regard for the rights of pedestrians. This would be one advantage that would come from developing generally the practice of the orderly and careful use of the streets.—New York Tribune.

General Booth and the Abbey

THERE is a natural demand among Englishmen of all classes for the highest post-mortem honor in the case of the founder and successful director of the Salvation Army—burial in Westminster Abbey. William Booth was, to be sure, a lifelong and aggressive dissenter, and the Abbey is a temple of the Established Church. But, as the canon of Westminster, Dr. Henson, said yesterday, no question of creed has ever been considered in relation to burial in the Abbey, which, by the way, contains monuments to both the Wesleys and other dissenters of renown, including Milton, who was a foe to the Established Church, and Dr. Isaac Watts.

In the case of General Booth, however, the tribute of burial in the Abbey would be paid to one who was a dissenter above everything else, who threw off all denominational shackles, who preached and taught religion wholly according to his own lights. Nevertheless, the honor is richly deserved. No man of his time did more for the benefit of the people than William Booth. He placed charity on a practical basis. He taught religion to the lowliest in terms which they could comprehend. Cleanliness, decency, and the will to do good thrived under his rule. The dean of Westminster will undoubtedly have the approval of all the churchmen in this liberal hour if he offers a grave in the historic Abbey for the body of William Booth.—New York Times.

Ruralized Schools

A BULLETIN from the North Dakota Agricultural College tells in concrete form of facts which speak louder for ruralizing the rural schools than reams of treatises could do. Several years ago 157 country boys and 174 country girls in Wright County, Ia., were asked what they meant to do as a life-work. All but seven of the boys said that they "would have nothing to do with farming." All but eleven of the girls gave a similar verdict against the life in which they had been reared and of which they knew most. During the next three years, through the efforts of a fine county superintendent, the schools were made over into real country schools by the teaching of agriculture and home economics. The same questions were then put to the same pupils. This time 163 out of 174 boys and 161 out of 178 girls said they were planning to remain on the farm.

Educate the children, and the colleges and the fertility of the soil will be taken care of.—Farm and Fireside.

Unlucky Number for Dakota Woman.

The question whether the number "13" is really more unlucky than any other number has never been entirely settled.

A So. Dak. woman, after thirteen years of misery from drinking coffee, found a way to break the "unlucky spell." Tea is just as injurious as coffee because it contains caffeine, the drug in coffee. She writes:

"For thirteen years I have been a nervous wreck from drinking coffee. My liver, stomach, heart—in fact, my whole system being actually poisoned by it.

"Last year I was confined to my bed for six months. Finally it dawned on me that coffee caused the trouble. Then I began using Postum instead of coffee, but with little faith, as my mind was in such a condition that I hardly knew what to do next.

"Extreme nervousness and failing eyesight caused me to lose all courage. In about two weeks after I quit coffee and began to use Postum, I was able to read and my head felt clear. I am improving all the time and I will be a strong, well woman yet.

"I have fooled more than one person with a delicious cup of Postum. Mrs. S. wanted to know where I bought my fine coffee. I told her my grocer had it and when she found out it was Postum she has used it ever since, and her nerves are building up fine.

"My brain is strong, my nerves steady, my appetite good, and best of all, I enjoy such sound pleasant sleep." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Get the little book in pkg., "The Road to Wellville." "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

has millions of acres still awaiting the right kind of men to develop them and make them productive.

¶ Much progress has been made in building up Minnesota's farms, towns and villages, its schools and churches, its roads and bridges, its telephone lines and rural mail service—yet there are still too many large farms, and more farmers are needed to cultivate the soil as well as men to build up the towns.

¶ The northern part of the state is very largely a region of most fertile soil still unoccupied, where homeseekers can get government lands, or state lands, or cut-over timber lands at low prices. These lands are specially valuable for dairying and stock raising. Sales of state land are held April to November, each year—write for information.

¶ Minnesota climate is healthful; the air dry and clear. Minnesota is a beautiful state, with rolling well-drained land and thousands of lakes, large and small, inviting to summer outings, boating and angling. The woods in the Northern part afford game of various kinds for the sportsman.

¶ In short, Minnesota is a delightful place in which to work, to live and to enjoy life.

¶ The great markets in close proximity at the Head of the Lakes (Duluth-Superior) and the Twin Cities, (St. Paul-Minneapolis), offer a ready and convenient disposal of farm products.

HE NEW WOMAN IN THE EAST

WHILE so much interest is being awakened in the cause of woman's advancement in Western countries, the following graphic sentences, taken from ...sticle in the International Review ...ssions for January, 1912, will be ...ciated. The article, entitled ...Place of Women in the Modern ...tual Movements of the East," is ...n by Miss Agnes de Selincourt.

'...ou know,' said an old Mohammeheikh as he somewhat timorously ...mplated the prospect of modern ...tion for his little girl, 'you know, not care to have our daughters ...n school very long.' 'Oh, but all ...is past,' broke in a young Moslem ...who had ventured within the ...n precincts on a similar errand; ...country can never be great until ...omen are properly taught.'

...the old and the new are meeting ...in the East; the clash of con...g theories as to woman's rightful ...in the life of a nation is one of ...rces which is shaking society to ...undations. Not in one country ...is this phenomenon observable; ...ver the East is being touched ...the breath of awakening life, the ...n's question leaps into promi...

...ith the proclamation of the con...tion in Turkey in August, 1908, ...ands of women threw off their ...and streamed into the streets ...their husbands to join in the gen...shout of 'liberty.' Though this ...d to be a premature attempt and ...omen have since been forced back ...their former seclusion, yet below ...urface the ferment continues un...d, and it cannot be long before ...ocial life of Turkey is trans...d. The last few years have seen ...rth of a national consciousness in ...a, and with it there also an awak... has begun among the women. ...e town alone a hundred schools ...irls have been opened within a ... in one of the largest a mother ...found sitting in the same class ...her two daughters, the youngest ...ld of seven. In China, also, ...ls for girls are springing up like ...rooms in almost every province, ...hough, owing to the lack of quali...eachers, much of the work that is ... done is almost comically crude, ...e pathos of these women's eager... turns laughter into something ...r tears.

India, of which I wish principto speak, side by side with the ...h of national ideals and aspira... the woman's question grows ...ily in importance. Not only in ...uickly increasing percentage of ...attending school do we find traces ...e new spirit, but in every depart... of social life. Clubs are being ...ed, women's periodicals launched, ...thropic activities undertaken, all ...ed on by Indian women for Indian ...n. One of the most significant ...ments of the kind is the Bharat Mahamandal, a society formed in United Provinces last winter by ... advanced Hindu and Moslem ...n in the Empire. The following ...cts are from the inaugural ad... given at the meeting of the ...mandal: '"The hand that rocks ...radle rules the world." It is to ... ourselves worthy and efficient ...s, to equip ourselves with the fit... of sound rulers, to have our In... social world better governed, that ...Bharat Stri Mahamandal has been ...led. No nation can rise above the ... of its women. If that spirit be ...p the nation can never be wide ...e. Thus the Bharat Stri Maha...al is to form a common center for ...omen thinkers and women work... of every race, creed, class, and ... in India, to associate themselves ...her for the progress of humanity. ...secretaries and members of the ...itive body are always to be chosen ... the Hindu (including Sikh, Jain, ... Mussulman, Buddhist, and Parsi ...n of India. A certain number of "helpers" are to be selected from the Anglo-Indian and Christian members who join the Mahamandal. Their function will be to help the executive body by suggestions and ideas which are expected to be stored up in them by their greater experience in these lines of work, also to co-operate with us in any other way found practicable.'

"Those who know something of social conditions in the East even ten years ago will realize the swiftness and the significance of the appearance of these phenomena; one cannot but feel a measure of sympathy with the alarm and hesitancy of the old sheikh and his confrères, as they watch the old order changing, and wonder whereunto this will grow. Times of transition are always difficult, and the changes which we see taking place in the thoughts and ideals and opportunities of Eastern women are such as cannot but give food for serious reflection. And yet the dangers of advance can only be met by still further advance, and surely there are none who care for the progress of humanity, whose hearts do not throb in sympathy with these women, struggling, sometimes crudely, often mistakenly and yet passionately and sincerely, for light and knowledge and liberty. Who would not respond to the appeal lately voiced by a Hindu lady before a Western audience: 'It is clear that our advance as Indian women must be based on our national literature, our national ideals. In working out its steps, we need sympathy, we need the fellowship of all the noble women of the world'?"

important position. Even Russia, which has not yet entirely recovered from the humiliation which Japan gave her a few years ago, is to be represented. France, Italy. and Austria have already announced their intention to send official embassies. All the governments and courts of Europe have declared certain periods of court-mourning. Great Britain, as Japan's firmest ally, will observe a period of five weeks' mourning. Japan herself will retain the garb of grief for a year; the first six months being a period of deep mourning, and the last six of half-mourning.

Any pictorial representation of Shinto funeral services is extremely hard to come by, as they take place at night, and no flashlight photographs are to be had in this country. The most recently arrived pictures from Japan are those which accompany this article. The deep grief of the Japanese people has already been spoken of in these columns, and the pictures here reproduced show some of the scenes to which this grief led. Other photographs, which because of their indistinctness it was impossible for us to reproduce, showed school children and kimono-clad women bowed with their foreheads to the pavement of the courtyard, praying that the life of their Emperor might be spared.

A GRACIOUS APPRECIATION

Accept my thanks for the wonderful encyclopedia of knowledge, The Christian Herald Almanac, and the delightful stories in The Women of the Bible. Either of these is worth the subscription price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which for years has lain upon my library table for the entertainment and Christian culture of my family. With appreciation of your generous gifts, I am gratefully yours,

The Melting of Molly

MOLLY was the fairest and merriest of widows—and the plumpest! That too, too solid flesh was the cause of all the trouble. Molly loved Alfred Bennett in her girlhood days; now he was coming home a distinguished diplomat, and wanted to see MOLLY in the same Blue Muslin Dress (waist measure twenty inches) which she had worn at their tender parting years before. So Molly had to grow slim as a string-bean in just three months. And as she had at least four suitors, the melting process—a fairly complicated business—was often interrupted. ¶ The gay, irresistible Molly, all sweetness and spice and everything nice, is a most fetching heroine. ¶ Everybody will become a lover of this irresistible girl who makes her bow to the readers of THE HOUSEWIFE this fall. ¶ Many other charming stories will appear in THE HOUSEWIFE in rapid succession, including:

"The Romance of Jedediah," by L. M. Montgomery, Author of "Anne of Green Gables" and "Anne of Avonlea."
"Controlling Tennyson," by Rose Willis Johnson.
"Love Cottage," by Anne Shannon Monroe.
"The O'Hara Epidemic," by Louise Rand Bascom.
"A Knight There Was," by Eleanor H. Porter.
"The Joy of Creation," by Rose Seelye Miller.
"Felicia-Patricia," by Maude Woodruff Newell.
"The Frigidity of Frankenstein," by William Hamilton Osborne.
"The Christmas Spirit," by J. J. Bell.
"One Merry Christmas," by Harriet Prescott Spofford.
"When a Woman Will," by Harriet Lummis Smith.
"Pat," by Kilbourne Cowles.
"Christmas on the Corkscrew," by Carmelita Carasco.
"Clarisse of the Cronanqua," by B. M. Connor.

And these general interest articles:

"The Glory Hole" "A Cookery Thanksgiving Party"
"The Care of the Breadbox"
"The Criminal in the Home" "Going to the Candy Store with Johnny"
"Dividing the Middleman's Tax"

And the following Medical Articles by Famous Experts:

"The Mouth and Its Relation to Disease," by Dr. Samuel A. Hopkins.
"Indigestion, Its Causes and Treatment," by Dr. Franklin W. White.
"Teeth and Their Care," by Dr. Herbert Locke Wheeler.

THE HOUSEWIFE is an interesting magazine edited in behalf of the woman who has the interests of her home at heart. It has departments on Cooking, Fancy Work, Fashions, Home Decoration, Entertainment, and the Care of Children, and in addition THE HOUSEWIFE publishes the best stories and serials ever presented in a magazine of its price, and is beautified by colored covers and many illustrations throughout.

and weak and giving them another chance to attain success and happiness. Accept my deep sympathy."

General Booth left with a famous banking house in London a sealed envelope which contained his wishes as to who should succeed him as the head of the Salvation Army. As was generally expected, the command devolved upon his oldest son, W. Bramwell Booth, who has been identified with the activities of the army since he was a mere lad.

Just before his death General Booth had outlined two new lines of work to be added to the already elaborate system of rescue homes, slum outposts, labor bureaus, food depots, shelters, factories and homes for inebriates. One of these schemes was the establishment of poor London families upon small farms of five or six acres in English country districts. The second project might almost be termed of national importance, for it provided for the colonization of portions of Rhodesia.

In addition to his other activities General Booth was a writer of books and a publisher of newspapers. Among his books are Salvation Soldiery, The Training of Children, Letters to Soldiers and Holy Living. His best-known volume, Darkest England and the Way Out, contains a scheme for the education and industrial support of the lowest classes. In 1890 General Booth established the War Cry as the Army's weekly organ. It now appears weekly in England and at each colonial and foreign headquarters, so that there are thirty-four weekly War Cry editions in various languages.

It was said of him after his death: "General Booth, to whose extraordinary abilities as a preacher and organizer the success of the institution and its branches has been most largely due, has not differed so very greatly in his evangelical methods from the great evangelists of the past. He has taught the people religion in their own terms, as the medieval monks did with their miracles and mysteries. He has clothed all that he has needed of the creeds and articles of faith in the language spoken by his people. He has been enormously successful in uplifting the fallen, in placing them, at least, on a level perceptibly above the lowliest, in promoting temperance and decency as well as faith. He will be remembered as a great evangelist, as a force for righteousness, as a sincere man who devoted his whole life to the good of common humanity.

A WARRIOR CROWNED

In the fulness of years and of honors,
The patriarch goes to his rest:
The great soul, free and unfettered,
Has sped to the Home of the Blest.

Unheeding the sneers of the rabble,
The scoffs that Wealth flung at his cause;
He suffered and strove for the Master
Till contumely changed to applause.

Uncaring for worldly plaudits,
He ever looked up to his God;
And in spirit he faithfully followed
The way that the Nazarene trod.

Ever the friend of the friendless,
A brother to all in their need,
He took up the sinful and fallen,
Regardless of class or of creed.

In the gateways, the lanes and the alleys,
His voice was appealingly heard
Like John in the wilderness, crying:
"Prepare ye the way of the Lord."

Thousands on thousands of sinners,
From out of life's dregs and its dross,
He brought to the heavenly fountain
That wells at the foot of the Cross.

So to-day, in its depth of affection,
The world bows its head at his bier,
Mourning the guide who has left us—
The leader who never knew fear.

I, along with the rest of the mourners,
This flower of memory send,
To place on the grave of the Hero
Who was truly Humanity's Friend.

Concentration of Purpose —Not Spasmodic Improvements

NOT occasional, spasmodic change or improvement made the L. C. Smith gun what it is today—the gun with no shortcomings. The concentration of purpose of six men for 22 years did it.

The six Hunter Brothers keenly foresaw and held fast to one vital truth, i. e.: that any little shortcoming—seemingly but a trifle—in field or blind, will offset all your skill, wipe out all your well laid plans, and spoil a whole trip.

Concentration produced for the L. C. Smith gun a firing pin of vanadium steel—unbreakable—gas proof.

Concentration produced a rotary, clawing type of bolt, which takes up all wear, in all directions, by the double wedging of its double claws. The limit of breech bolting strength is reached by these claws entering frame after passing through extension rib. And so on through the list, Concentration of Purpose has solved long-standing gun troubles.

GET OUR FREE BOOKLET ON DOMESTIC VACUUM CLEANERS

We want every home in the country to have our FREE Booklet on DOMESTIC VACUUM CLEANERS. It's full of valuable information on Modern Housecleaning Methods.

It is impossible to keep a sanitary, healthful home if you clean house thoroughly but once or twice a year. One week after you have cleaned house by the old methods, disease-breeding dust is collecting in the texture of carpets and rugs, beyond the reach of the broom and sweeper. The safe, also-reliable and SANITARY method is to use a

Domestic Vacuum Cleaner

Run an easy-running Domestic over your carpets and rugs every day or two as you would a carpet sweeper, and you keep them as clean and bright as new every day in the year. You keep the surface clean—you keep every thread of the texture clean, and, what is more, you keep the floor beneath the carpet as clean as your kitchen table. The DOMESTIC is the ONLY Vacuum Cleaner with full ball-bearings. The Domestic is the only vacuum cleaner with a ball-bearing roller adjustment to support the nozzle—causing the nozzle to roll and not drag and wear the carpets as others do.

THE ONE THAT HAS BEARING ROLLER is an exclusive DOMESTIC feature which sets the nozzle and does not permit the nozzle to drag and wear the nap of the carpet needless.

The DOMESTIC is wonderfully well made and will last a lifetime.

The DOMESTIC is made in the largest and best equipped factory in the world devoted to the exclusive manufacture of vacuum cleaners. More than 100,000 DOMESTICS are in daily use in all parts of the world. We make them to sell at all prices. Write TODAY for our Free Booklets.

IN DEFENSE OF THE SPARROW

I HAVE noticed of late in several papers requests to farmers and others to help destroy the English sparrows. Having observed them for many years, and at all seasons of the year, I feel called upon to defend them for their many good qualities which seem to be quite generally overlooked. Few people seem to realize that the English sparrow has been responsible for the great reduction of the numbers of bottle-flies, the castrophilus equi, or horse-fly. Forty years ago when the sparrows were not as plentiful as they are to-day these flies were so numerous that they were a great torment to horses and cattle, and often caused great discomfort to human beings. The entire life history of this fly is identified with the horse. The larvæ are developed in such a way that the sparrows' particular virtues as a scavenger lead him to discover them and use them for food. As a result of this the horse-fly, though not entirely done away with, is not one-quarter as prevalent as it formerly was.

It has been claimed that the sparrow is largely a seed-eating bird, but a careful observer will notice that during the breeding season the sparrows gather great numbers of small beetles, moth-millers and other insects to feed to their young. Then as seed-eaters they undoubtedly do inestimable service as the destroyers of the seeds of troublesome and noxious weeds. It must be admitted that the sparrow is a quarrelsome little chap and a great deal of a bully. He undoubtedly drives the more peaceable birds from their nesting places. This is specially true of the wrens and the martins, which seemed to be particularly fond of using bird-houses constructed for them by man. From the wren's house the sparrow can be kept out by making the openings to the house too small for him to get his rather bulky body through. The wren needs only an opening an inch in diameter or at largest as big as a quarter to go in and out. The martin requires a larger opening and as he is usually a late-comer in the spring he finds that the sparrows have already set up housekeeping in his last year's home. About the only way that this can be prevented is to screen or in some way close the doors of the bird-house when its occupants flit south in the fall, and open them again in the spring only when careful watch shows that the martins are back again. The all too rapid disappearance of those birds which formerly nested in close proximity to man's dwelling-places may not be entirely due to the pugnacious disposition of the sparrow. It is greatly to be feared that the household tabby is equally guilty. There is no doubt that the goldfinches, summer warblers and other orchard and shrub-nesting birds have been driven away by the ever-increasing number of cats in small towns and country places as well as in the larger cities.

The greatest of Teachers used the sparrow of Palestine, which was a bird very similar to the English sparrow, as one of his most telling illustrations. "Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God? . . . Fear not, therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows." So the little fellow is surely deserving of some consideration at our hands. While feeding the birds during the winter I have often been asked, "Why do you feed those useless and troublesome sparrows? If they are strong enough and hardy enough to drive away almost every other sort of bird, they can surely forage for themselves." My only answer is, "Because, though Christ mentioned them as one of his Father's most inconsequential creations, yet he used them to teach us a great lesson, and as even the smallest of his creatures they are deserving of our care."

The Howard Watch

The American business man, it is said, never writes when he can "wire." He sends 500,000 telegrams every working day, keeping fifty-nine thousand offices busy and nearly two million miles of wire.

It is an index of the national spirit of "putting the thing across"—getting it done. The same spirit of punctuality and practical time-saving that leads so many men to select the HOWARD Watch.

Whether a man realizes it or not—his working activities don't escape being judged by HOWARD standards. There are HOWARD Watches in the pockets of his superiors and his associates—and probably some of his subordinates.

Not every HOWARD owner is a moneyed man, by any means. The most eager purchasers of HOWARDS are the earnest young fellows who have to strain a point to get one—like any other special effort they make to get ahead.

Any way you look at it, to the man who really cares, a HOWARD Watch is always worth what he pays for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Admiral Sigsbee has written a little book, "The Log of the HOWARD Watch," giving the record of his own HOWARD in the U. S. Navy. You'll enjoy it. Drop us a post-card, Dept. W, and we'll send you a copy.

Sea Fishing Through Arctic Ice

Clad for Cold and Labor

HARDSHIPS OF A LABRADOR WINTER

THE ice has just left Labrador, and in a few days we may have our mission ship Harmony here again. I therefore wish to write you a brief account of some of our experiences during the past winter.

I am sorry to say that the past winter season has been one of extreme poverty with most of our Eskimos. In the autumn, the seal fishing, which furnishes the native with nearly all requirements for daily use, failed. The new ice set in early in November, before the migration of these animals had fully begun, and cut the hunt short. During winter, foxes and other fur-bearing animals were extremely scarce, and in consequence many of our people were reduced to want.

I have not known so poor a winter during the whole of my stay among the Eskimos (now twenty-two years). While the coast is icebound, the days short, snowstorms frequent and the thermometer often forty below zero, it is not possible for the Eskimo to do much to secure a living. One way for the women to produce something was to cut holes through the sea ice (which reaches a thickness here of six feet), and there they stood, fishing for rock cod, most days only securing between five and ten fish. The Mission endeavored to help, but poverty was so general that all resources were taxed to the utmost.

An outsider has no idea of what poverty among the Eskimos means. At the best of times, the wants of the Eskimos are few, and their food consists of the coarsest of substances. Seal, walrus and whale meat form a large part of their diet, and the blubber of these animals serves in the place of pork or butter.

In China, the famished inhabitants subsisted on roots or some other inferior vegetation, but here the vegetable kingdom has nothing to offer. The earth is frozen and deeply covered with snow and ice; the birds have gone south, and one might walk for miles without seeing a living creature. At the same time, it is of interest to know how even these primitive people have for ages found a kind of substitute for food somewhere. Along a beach which is known to have plenty of seaweed, holes are cut through the thick ice and the seaweed and mussels pulled up through the holes, and it is on record that the Eskimos have sustained life on this, one might say, refuse of the sea, during the long winter months.

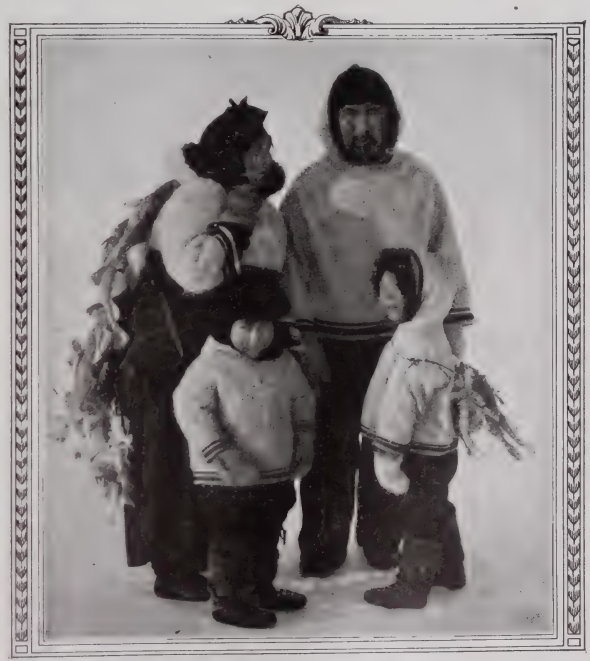
The Eskimo has no word for "God" in his language, and it has been fitly remarked that the very austere aspect of life may have helped to exclude the conception of a superhuman benevolent Being from the beliefs and superstitions of these people of the Arctic.

I can hardly express my thankfulness for the kindness of your readers in putting at my disposal means to help on the Mission work. During the extreme poverty of the past months, I was glad to be able to help; but in order that the aid rendered should be a lasting one, I formed a kind of co-operative self-help society among our Nain people. This society has for its aim to relieve poverty during the extreme part of winter. Each beneficiary received $5 in cash, and pledged himself to refund this in summer, with an addition of from one to five dollars. During the succeeding winter he is permitted not only to renew the original loan of $5, but also the additional sum, however much that might be, and thus he is enabled to increase his credit year by year. We hope that in this way poverty may be relieved during seasons in which the people are frequently unable to help themselves.

At the end of the benevolent experiment I find that I have considerably overstepped the amount at disposal, but nevertheless I venture to hope that your kind CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will again help our work this year.

CHRISTIAN SCHMITT.

Nain, Labrador.



At the Close of a Day's Successful Fishing

Christian Schmitt, Dr. Grenfell and other laborers, taking the Gospel to the strange dwellers of Labrador, are carrying forward the brave work begun in 1852, when the first missionaries to that country were sent out by the London congregation of Moravians. The story of missions in Labrador is a romance in which tragedy and triumph are strangely mingled. Erhardt, leader of the first band, was murdered by the natives, and a number of his companions perished with him. The second expedition was made in 1764, and in 1769 100,000 acres were granted to the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel. On August 10, 1770, a group of missionaries landed at a point 180 miles north of the station occupied by the first band, and the newcomers called the new location Nain, the present headquarters of Mr. Schmitt's work. The first ingathering of souls began in 1804, and by 1818 six hundred natives were connected with the missions. Besides the Moravians, the Church Missionary Society has done successful work.

ON TO Zürich" is the rallying cry of the Sunday-school world. Mr. E. K. Warren, a well-known manufacturer of Three Oaks, Mich., was recently appointed admiral of the World's Sunday-School Fleet, in which some two thousand delegates from the United States and Canada will cross the ocean next summer. Four ocean liners have been chartered for the purpose, viz., the White Star liner Canopic, 12,000 tons; the Donaldson Line steamship Letitia, 10,000 tons; the Allan Line steamship Scotian, 10,500 tons; and the Red Star liner Zealand, 12,000 tons.

According to the plans which Admiral Warren has laid out for this remarkable voyage, the Canopic, which the admiral now believes will be his flagship, will make the longest tour. She will sail from Boston on June 12, 1913. A couple of days afterwards the Letitia will sail from Montreal, and on the 21st of June the Scotian will sail from the same port, while the Zealand will depart two days afterwards from New York. The Canopic will go to the Mediterranean cities, while the Letitia will touch first at Glasgow. The Scotian will land her passengers at London, and the Sunday-school workers on the Zealand will embark at Cherbourg, France. In the end, however, the passengers will all come together at Zürich, Switzerland, where the convention will be held from July 8 to 15, 1913. Various meetings and small conventions have been planned to be held during the voyage, and the passengers will have an opportunity of exchanging ideas on Sunday-school work.

Earth's ends will meet at the Zürich Convention, and there will be present representative Sunday-school specialists, pastors, teachers and missionaries from all parts of the world. Europe, Asia, Africa and the islands of the sea, as well as America, will have their representatives at this gathering. Committees in Europe and America have been busy for months past completing arrangements, and it is believed that their efforts will be rewarded by a gathering of greater magnitude and power than has ever been recorded in the modern Sunday-school movement.

Zürich is beautifully situated at the base of the snow-clad Swiss Alps, a center of art, culture and commerce; a Mecca for students of the history of the Protestant Reformation; and the scene of the historic efforts of Zwingli and other leaders of the world's battle for religious liberty. The mayor of the town will welcome Admiral Warren and his Sunday-school multitude. The leaders of the state church are co-operating with the representatives of the free churches in a large local committee of arrangements of which Pastor Ruegg, one of the lecturers of the University of Zürich, is president. The Tonhalle, a stately edifice containing several halls, will be the Convention home. The citizens will entertain free five hundred Continental delegates. Provision is made for conducting the Convention in English, German, French and Italian. The chief interpreter is Dr. Levering of Germany, who speaks twenty-seven languages.

The Program Committee of the Convention is planning to make the events of the occasion of exceptional practicability in every branch of Sunday-school work, and with such leaders as Gipsy Smith, Rev. Samuel M. Zwemer, D.D., Pastor Charles Bieler, Rev. F. B. Meyer, A.B., Rev. James I. Good, D.D, and others, they will doubtless accomplish their purpose.

Under the direction of Mr. Hugh Cork, an exhaustive Sunday-school exhibit will be placed in the Convention hall, so that the delegates may study the extent and condition of Sunday-school work in all parts of the world. The music will be in charge of Dr. A. J. Burker, a native of Zürich, and an artist of rare ability. The musical program will include a special concert by the symphony orchestra in Zürich, a large chorus of Swiss singers, and a hearty participation by the Convention itself in sacred songs that have stirred the Christian wo for centuries.

The afternoons of the Zürich Convention h been set aside by the Program Committee for c ferences, denominational rallies, sectional gath ings and other special meetings.

The two thousand delegates sailing with Sunday-School Fleet will not be, however, the en number of delegates to the Convention from t country. An earlier contingent of delegates Sunday-school specialists, led by Mr. H. J. He will leave this country early in 1913 to visit Orient to study Sunday-school conditions and ne and to hold from twenty to thirty Sunday-sch conventions and institutes while en route to World's Sunday-School Convention in Zürich. first party will leave San Francisco in Janu 1913, for the Philippine Islands, where a series public gatherings will be held. The second pa will leave San Francisco in March, 1913, and j the first party in Tokyo, Japan, in cherry-blos time. The united forces will travel through Jap China and Korea, thence over the Trans-Siber Railway to the Convention.

There are 600,000 child in the Philippines who sp English. A Sunday-sch union, organized in 1911, which 2,000 were present, which was addressed by Gov nor General Forbes, Bish Brent and others, now ha membership of 40,000 un the leadership of Rev. H. McLoughlin, secretary of Bible Society.

Japan is one of the fin fields for Sunday-school wo At a recent Sunday-school c vention held in Tokyo, m than twelve thousand w present. There are now o one hundred thousand schola enrolled in the Japanese Su day schools. A remarka Sunday-school awakening manifest in China, with 100,0 in the Sunday schools. R. E. R. Tewksbury, of Shangh is secretary of the Chinese Sunday school, and has native secretaries in every province whom trains for service. Six translators are constan at work on Sunday-school books and the dema greatly exceeds the supply. In Korea many Su day schools are being organized, several having regular attendance of from one to two thousa In one town of 4,000 population there are 2,300 Sunday school.

The evolution of the World's Sunday-School Fl began in 1904, when 1,500 delegates from 26 co tries and 55 denominations assembled in a t pitched just north of Gordon's Calvary in Jeru lem, and held a convention that stirred the religi world. A specially chartered ship carried 8 delegates from America to the Holy City, while other ship sailed from London with 575 delega representing Great Britain. The inspiration a fellowship of these gatherings, followed by the markable events of the convention, created a p found impression. Three years later two ch tered ships were necessary to carry the Americ delegates to Rome, where a convention was held the Methodist Church located on the historic Tw tieth-of-September Street, over which the liberat General Garibaldi, had passed thirty-seven ye before in his great march for the liberation of Ita

SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS ADJOURNS

AFTER a continuous session of 267 days, since December 4, 1911—the longest since the second session of the Fifty-third Congress, which occupied 268 days—the Sixty-second Congress adjourned at 4.30 P.M. on August 26. The closing hours were exceedingly busy ones. There was a sharp struggle between the two houses as to the General Deficiency Bill; and the State claims of Maryland, Virginia, Oregon and Texas for $600,000 and a proposal to add $200,000 to the pay of Capitol employees were abandoned by the Senate, the attitude of the House being unyielding on these appropriations. They will probably be revived in the Urgent Deficiency Bill at the next session. With these items omitted, the General Deficiency Bill was passed and it was signed by the President before five o'clock P.M. A number of nominations sent in by the President failed of confirmation. These included over sixty appointments of postmasters and several judges.

It is estimated that altogether the Congress just closed has appropriated in the aggregate of $1,000,000,000, being some $7,000,000 less than the last Congress disposed of. It should be stated, however, that the last Congress provided $45,560,000 for the Panama Canal, and this, the Republican minority claims, should be deducted in making the comparison between the gross appropriations of the two Congresses.

The usual animated scenes took place immediately after adjournment. Members shook hands with each other, wishing good-bye. Old-time political feuds were forgotten and all fraternized in the friendliest fashion. Although the number of members on the floor was by no means large, the galleries were crowded with friends and relatives. Speaker Clark wished that absent members might have enjoyable vacations and that they would return refreshed and invigorated for the work next winter. The actual work of the sixty-second Congress has occupied 408 days.

Canal Legislation

THE bill which has aroused the widest discussion is that fixing the methods of controlling and operating the Panama Canal. The bill as first drafted exempted American vessels from toll, or, what amounts to the same thing, provided for the remission of tolls paid. This provoked a furious storm of protest in Europe, and many American newspapers joined with foreign voices in declaring that this provision was a direct violation of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, which gave assurances that no discrimination in favor of any nation would be made. The objectionable feature was finally removed from the bill, but a section was retained providing that American vessels engaged in coastwise trade should be allowed to pass through the canal without payment of toll.

This bill the President signed on August 25, but the storm of foreign disapproval was only slightly abated. British and continental newspapers still insist that the bill violates both the letter and spirit of the treaty. The contention of the United States Government is that the coastwise trade is entirely a domestic matter. In fact, one British writer points out very forcefully, in an article appearing in The Nation, one of the leading British weeklies, that the United States already forbids foreign vessels to engage in its coastwise trade, and declares that it is difficult to see why, having granted this restriction without complaint, the powers should now insist that the United States must be compelled to collect canal tolls from its own vessels, engaged in a trade from which all other vessels have been excluded.

"If the treaty," says this writer, "meant that American ships which enjoyed a monopoly under the navigation laws when plying round Cape Horn, between the eastern and western coasts of America, should lose that monopoly when they used the canal, it should certainly have said so, but no one ever suggested that the treaty suspends the operation of the navigation laws when the coasting trade goes through the canal."

This is precisely the position taken by President Taft in the memorandum to Congress accompanying his signature to the bill. Quoting the British protest, he denies the right of that government to "read into the treaty a surrender by the United States of its right to regulate its own commerce in its own way and by its own methods." He pointed out that many nations reimburse their merchant vessels for tolls paid at Suez, and some are preparing to do the same at Panama. To prevent the United States from exercising this privilege to its own shipping would place us, as the builders and owners of the canal, at a serious disadvantage compared with other nations. The following from the official memorandum explains the President's views of the case:

"Since the rules do not provide, as a condition for the privilege of use upon equal terms with other nations, that other nations desiring to build up a particular trade involving the use of the canal shall not either directly agree to pay the tolls or to refund to their ships the tolls collected for the use of the canal, it is evident that the treaty does not affect that inherent, sovereign right, unless, which is not likely, it be claimed that the promulgation by the United States of these rules insuring all nations against its discrimination would authorize the United States to pass upon the action of other nations and require that no one of them should grant to its shipping larger subsidies or more liberal inducements for the use of the canal than were granted by others.

"In other words, that the United States has the power to equalize the practice of other nations in this regard.

"The British protest, therefore, is a proposal to read into the treaty a surrender by the United States of its right to regulate its own commerce in its own way and by its own methods, a right which neither Great Britain herself nor any other nation that may use the canal has surrendered or proposes to surrender.

"The policy of exempting the coastwise trade from all tolls really involves the question of granting a government subsidy for the purpose of encouraging that trade in competition with the trade of the transcontinental railroads. I approve this policy. It is in accord with the historical course of the government in giving government aid to the construction of the transcontinental roads. It is now merely giving government aid to a means of transporation that competes with these transcontinental roads."

European Geographers on the Summit of Mt. Beacon, N. Y.

THE AMERICAN Geographical Society of New York is having a two-fold celebration to mark the sixtieth anniversary of its founding and the completion of its new home, which, for architectural beauty and general utility, will be second to none in the world. This body has cause to rejoice, for short as has been its existence it has made such mighty strides in the fields of exploration and science that it is recognized as the peer of any similar institution in Europe. This is emphasized by the fact that some forty-four geographers, men acclaimed as masters in their special lines of investigation and research and exploration, have come from the great seats of European learning to do honor to their American brethren on the auspicious occasion of the dual celebration. These visitors typify the highest degree of Continental scholarship and progress, of which we hear so much on this side of the water, and it will be most interesting to have their views and impressions of our country. They are getting a fine opportunity to study us at close range, for the Society is sparing no efforts, not alone to give its guests a good time of enjoyment and recreation, but to show to them the material side of our country, to give them an inside view of the workings which enable the wheels of our national machinery to revolve. They have seen our great metropolitan city, its sky-scrapers, its subways, its suspended bridges, its elevated roads, its mighty manufactories and hives of industry, where the shuttles and spindles and wheels of business never cease to hum; they have been taken through Wall Street, America's financial center; they have visited our great colleges and seats of learning, and they have been bidden as guests to some of America's palatial homes. As a result, these serious men, scientists and savants, representing the conservatism of the Old World, have been deeply impressed not only with the giant strides we have made in material advancement, but also by the mental and social progress we have made in the race of nations.

The sights of New York have given them an incentive to see the rest of the country and with a score or so of their American brethren as guides, they are now off on a continental tour to the Pacific Coast. They will visit nearly all the States of the Union and their American friends will make sure that they miss none of the great sights.

IMPORTANT EVENTS AT HOME AND ABROAD

DISTRESSING reports of wars and threats of wars come from many lands. Besides the revolution in Nicaragua, there have been further disturbances in Mexico, mutinies in China, alarming indications that there is danger of the partitioning of Persia, plots of Cretan filibusters to attack the island of Samos, trouble in Turkey, besides continuing the war with Italy, has had its more clashes with the governments of Servia and Montenegro and has had a serious time with insurgents in Albania.

AFTER ORDERING the Tenth Regiment, on August 28, to proceed from Panama to Nicaragua for the purpose of protecting American life and property in the distracted republic, President Taft, on the day following rescinded the order, stating that the forces of marines and sailors available for duty there were sufficient to handle the situation. The first message was sent from Beverly just as the President was leaving his summer home for a trip to Ohio. All along the way he was in touch with naval and military authorities and with the State Department, and the telegram rescinding the marching orders to the Tenth Regiment was sent from the President's train at Rochester, N. Y. Mr. Taft believed that by September 3 there would be a thousand marines on Nicaraguan soil. This government has been asked by President Diaz to assist in quelling the revolution which has continued to assume serious proportions. Reports of atrocities committed by the insurgents have been denied by the revolutionary leaders, but there has been considerable bloodshed, railroads have been blocked and some Americans have been in great danger. A massacre occurred at Leon, in which two Americans, Dodd and Phillips, were killed.

—ORDINARILY the world at large is not intensely interested in the social affairs of the millionaires' colony at Newport, but it happens that a few of the recent events there have attracted the attention not only of the American people but of the citizens of Great Britain as well. One Newport matron gave an evening's entertainment to her friends at a cost which was estimated by social experts at $100,000. Within a few evenings another lady provided an entertainment at a cost of $200,000. These figures seem almost incredible. Their publication was greeted with many caustic comments, the most bitter of which was probably that made by a British paper, which declared that the entertainments were not only errors on the part of good judgment but also in the matter of good taste. For the second entertainment an entire troupe of actors and actresses was engaged to come from one of the leading New York theaters at an expense of $5,000. In marked contrast with these two exhibitions was one held at a home of equal prominence at which a real effort was made to provide entertainment without extravagance, and the expressions of pleasure at this last function differed widely from anything said by those who participated in the dreadfully gorgeous functions which had preceded it.

—FLOODS raged throughout England during the latter part of August. Heavy rains inundated large sections of the country, causing extensive damage to crops and property.

—MR. J. L. RICAUD, treasurer of the Flood Relief Committee, Baton Rouge, La., writes, acknowledging receipt of an additional remittance of $1,000 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to be applied in aid of the flood sufferers. He adds: "I am pleased to state that all who were forced to leave their homes in the flooded district have returned and are now endeavoring to resume normal conditions. The Relief Committee has directed its labors in the direction of rehabilitation, and we believe that the results are indeed gratifying. The results are due mainly to the ample funds with which the committee has been provided, and in this connection we have noted the splendid contributions emanating through your efforts, and the committee wishes to avail itself of this opportunity to extend its appreciation in behalf of the beneficiaries."

THE THANKFUL HEART

A SERMON

BY

Rev. Orville T. Fletcher *

TEXT: "Be ye thankful." Col. 3: 15

GRATITUDE has been called "the fairest blossom which springs from the soul; and the heart of man knoweth none more fragrant." Cicero said, "A thankful heart is not only the greatest virtue but the parent of all other virtues." The Bible teaches the same truth, and our own enlightened hearts confirm it.

Gratitude is not a gift but a growth; not a prize but a product; not a fiat but a fruit; not a bequest but a conquest. It cannot be purchased; it must be produced. But it is worth all the cost and care of its cultivation. It blesses him who has it and him that receives it. It brings joy to its possessor and joy to whom it is proffered.

It may be defined as the confession of obligation; the acknowledgment of appreciation; the attitude of gratification; the natural response of the heart for benefits intended or received, accompanied with the desire to requite, and, if possible, to repay. Let us analyze this attitude or spirit of gratitude.

First, it is a spirit of thoughtfulness. Think and thank come from the same Anglo-Saxon word. There can be no thankfulness without thoughtfulness. If you would be thankful, begin to think—think of all you have received; count your blessings; think of the debt you owe for kindnesses received. Set yourself to recognize every obligation. Think and you will thank. The more we know the more grateful we ought to become. Paul said, "Knowledge puffeth up"; and another wrote, "A little learning is a dangerous thing," but Jesus said, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." And one of the things from which knowledge of the truth will make us free is conceit, and another is ignorance, which has been called the root of every sin; and a third equally important to be freed from is ingratitude. How can one know the truth about God in all that he has done and is doing; all he has been and is; all he has promised and prepared, and not be grateful to him for his loving kindness and tender mercy, and for his wonderful works to the children of men? It is ignorance that breeds ingratitude. The thankless heart is the thoughtless heart. How can we be grateful for blessings that we do not recognize? And, on the other hand, how can we fail to be grateful when we truly realize their value? Because he knew, David said, "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good; his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations."

The Multitude of Our Mercies

We ought at times to stop and consider the multitude and the magnitude of the things for which we ought to be thankful. A Latin poet tells us that "Thanks are justly due for things got without purchase." To know their limit or their limitlessness, one should try to answer Paul's question to the Corinthians, "What hast thou that thou didst not receive?" What a debt we owe to the past! What a debt we owe to the present! Who can measure the goodness of God to us? His gifts are unnumbered, unmeasured and unmerited. "Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights," and every gift from God is a good gift and a perfect one. No sincere man can see God's goodness and not be grateful for it. Alas, that we are so blind and slow of heart to see God's hand helping us, his light leading us, his Spirit serving us! We need to remember that "Back of the loaf is the snowy flour,

And back of the flour is the mill,
And back of the mill the seed and the shower
And the sun and the Father's will."

Surely we ought to be grateful. There is sufficient reason for it. True, there are many things which it is hard to be thankful for, but only because we do not see the wisdom and love of God, or the end of his endeavor. We misunderstand God's gifts. We do not see the end from the beginning, or the harvest in the seed. A better knowledge of God would save us from missing the meaning of his mysterious acts. If we knew God better we would trust him more. How often we grieve when we should be glad! Truly did Mrs. Browning say:

"Methinks we do as fretful children do,
Leaning their faces on the window-pane
To sigh the glass dim with their own breath's stain,
And shut the sky and landscape from their view.
And thus, alas! since God the maker drew
A mystic separation 'twixt those twain,
The life beyond us, and our souls in pain,
We miss the prospect which we're called unto
By griefs we're fools to use. Be still and strong,
O man, my brother! Hold thy sobbing breath
And keep thy soul's large window pure from wrong—
That so as life's appointment issueth,
Thy vision may be clear to watch along
The sunset consummation—lights of death."

Nowhere are we told to be thankful for everything, but "in everything give thanks." If we possess the spirit of gratitude we shall be strong to wait God's time for the unveiling of his mysteries and the fulfilling of his word. If we knew God better we would trust him more and be more grateful to him. Trust is an essential element of gratitude. The trustful are thankful; and the trustful are those who think.

Pride, the Enemy of Gratitude

Another element of gratitude is humility and a sense of honor. Pride has nothing in common with gratitude. It is utterly foreign to it and in eternal hostility to it. But it is the very nature of humility to be grateful. Humility accepts and acknowledges obligations; pride recognizes none. So, too, if we have a true sense of honor, we desire to make some return for benefits received. The man who has no honor will take all he can get and grumble because it is not more. Men who have honor feel the obligation that gifts impose, and gratitude grows out of that sense in an effort to repay if possible. It is vain to expect men without any self-pride or sense of honor to feel any promptings to gratitude. He who would increase his gratitude must cultivate his sense of honor, the sense that says, "I must do my duty; I must meet my responsibility; I must make recognition; I must square my obligations; I must give back as much or more than I have received." Yet, while one may never be able to square accounts, this sense of honor will increase the spirit of gratitude. There can be no real gratitude without it.

Close to this sense of honor we find another element in gratitude, viz., appreciation. No one who lacks this can be truly grateful. Gratitude demands appreciation. It goes before thanksgiving. It is the sense of worth. It is the ability to estimate values. It is the power to see beyond price and lay hold of the heart of things; to recognize motive; to weigh the spirit; to know the worth. It is a sympathetic recognition of excellence. It is the vital part of gratitude, the very life of it, the central principle in it. Without it thanksgiving is a cold, formal, perfunctory, lifeless thing. We may not be able adequately to express our appreciation in fitting forms, but it is possible to grow in our sense of appreciation by a reasonable, reverent, sympathetic regard for things till we shall have a genuine gratitude for them. How can the child be truly grateful for things whose worth to it and cost to others cannot be comprehended? No more can we without some degree of appreciation.

The fourth element in gratitude is nobleness. By that we mean the quality in human nature that can and will respond. It corresponds to the characteristic of some material things which we call resilience—the power of springing back to former condition or position—the rebound. You strike a soft substance and there is no rebound of the hammer; but there is resilience in the anvil. Nobleness is that quality in human nature that gives the rebound. It is to life what tone is to the instrument of music. You press the key and a certain sound is produced. When God plays upon the human heart by pouring blessings into it, if it have nobleness, resilience, it will respond, rebound, resound with gratitude and praise. But the heart that has no nobleness receives God's gifts without gratitude. There is no resilience. It is a heart of stone. It is not what Tennyson calls "a harp of a thousand strings." The more noble we are—that is, the more natural, sincere, obedient, believing, earnest, loving—the greater will be our gratitude. Goodness generates gratitude. "'Tis only noble to be good."

Closely akin to nobleness is the fifth element that goes to make up gratitude. It is kindness. K... dred and kindness spring from the same r... word and thus explain each other. We are kind... our kin because they are near and dear to ... Kindness is that spirit toward others that gove... our relations to those who are bound to us by ... ties of kinship and affection. The Way of Salvation

f father were living to-day,
Ah, then would I hie me away the homely old cottage once more, d I'd sit by the old kitchen door,
nder the big locust tree,
st only dear father and me—
If father were living to-day!

father were living to-day,
travel once more far away,
the old home cottage again,
d we'd walk down the cool, shaded lane here the odor of fall's in the trees, d the ripening fruits scent the breeze;
d to him would I gladly explain out my life's failures and pain—
If father were living to-day!

father were living to-day,
steal, oh, so quickly away,
the scenes of my boyhood once more,
d I'd knock at the old-fashioned door;
d it seems if I'd just step inside, ould leave all my burdens outside,
d be happy and free
I once used to be.
the sailor by storm-wind oppressed
ds safely a haven of rest;
I'd sleep with a perfect delight,
th the old scenes around me at night—
If father were living to-day!

necdotes from Northfield

HE speakers at the Northfield conferences this summer took from actual occurrences of life many of r illustrations of spiritual truths. W. R. Moody told of making a t to a Boston hospital in company a surgeon. A boy had been shot he head and the bullet had lodged ne brain. After the wound healed, right side became paralyzed and heart began to fail. The surgeon : "I must build up his heart and extract the bullet from his brain emove this paralysis. As long as bullet remains he will be helpless." Moody declared that just so sign matter of sin must all be n from the soul of a man or he have a spiritual paralysis and will not be able to use him.

r. A. C. Dixon related an incident day on which he was showing his e son the wonders of New York. king up at a "skyscraper" in pro- of erection, the boy said: "See, a! There are some little boys up e." "No," Dr. Dixon replied, "those full-sized grown men up there." en," said his son, "they will be small by the time they reach ven, won't they?" "What is man," the Psalmist, "that thou art dful of him?"

ne speaker told of a remark made an old-fashioned lady at the first ing meeting after the new pastor been installed in a Vermont rch. The new minister had been discussed when this lady summed he situation by saying: "Our new ister dresses all right. His clothes im and he looks good. But as to preachin', well, all I can say is, he n down deeper and stays down ger and comes up dryer than any acher I ever heerd."

FINDING THE RIGHT PLACE

CONSIDER how many persons there are in the wrong places in life and satisfied to stay there; and how many persons, on the other hand, are in the right places and anxious to get out of them. Where is anything more pitiful than a man or a woman who is a misfit in business or society, unable because of occupation or environment to express or develop the best qualities and talents which otherwise might give nobility and usefulness to life?

The skylark is a thing of joy and gladness as he > Runs up the golden stair

> That leads through cloudy gates from heaven to earth,
> And all alone in the empyreal air,
> Fills it with jubilant sweet songs of mirth.

The lake-trout, also, "the grand prize in the Lake George lottery," is a thing of joy. But let them try to change places!

The swarthy giant swinging the sledge hammer with mighty blows, or driving the drill deep into the rock to prepare for the blast, is admirable at his work. The skilful dentist, searching the tiny cavity and driving the gold into it with fine tools, is admirable also—when the ordeal is over and we are free to enjoy the results of his work. But let the two men change places!

Now and again ambitious parents try to do this very thing. They do not realize, in ambition for their offspring, that they are heading them straight to failure. The father who declares his son must be a doctor when nature fitted him for a mechanic may force him through college until he gets the desired diploma. Then, with "all his blushing honors thick upon his vacant head," the young M.D. settles down to kill people scientifically—to pour, as a famous writer said, drugs of which he knows little into bodies of which he knows less—till his incapacity is discovered, when he starves.

FAILURE in the wrong place may be a necessary preliminary to readjustment and success in the right place. A young man tried to establish himself as salesman in a drapery house, but his bluntness of speech constantly hindered his work. At length he received a brief note of dismissal. He went at once to the manager with an earnest protest against being turned out. "Surely I am good for something," he urged. "You are good for nothing as a salesman," declared his employer. "But I know I can be useful; don't send me off; try me at something besides selling; I'm no good at that." "Well, what can you do?" "I don't know yet, I only know I can make good if you'll find me the right place," insisted the young fellow. The merchant was induced to try him again and put him in the accounting department, where his aptness for figures was revealed. In a few years he became chief cashier and gained a reputation throughout the country as an expert accountant.

No young man or young woman should be in haste, however, to decide that such a change of place is essential to success. The more experience has been gained in one vocation the less reason is there for trying a new one. Nothing is more destructive of purpose, courage and ability in any work than the restless thought that perhaps in something else success might be won more easily or in greater measure. Persistence and concentration are indispensable to success anywhere.

HOW then can any of us know that we are in the right place? It is natural with all of us to want to do something greater and better than our present work. In every heart is a "ruling passion." We think that the thing we want most to do is the thing we could do best if given the chance. We applaud as a noble maxim the sentiment, "Our wishes are presentiments of our capabilities," and we resent any conditions or circumstances which restrict us to a narrow or uncongenial task.

We measure our calling too often by our own desires and tastes. We forget that our right place is not always where we want most to be, but where we are most needed. If all of us could choose our own places and our own work in the world, how many places would be left vacant; how much needful work would be left undone.

GOOD Dr. T. De Witt Talmage wrote once, "If you can perform your work easily, without being cramped or exhausted, that is your right place. That man is in a horrible condition who is ever making prodigious efforts to do more than he can do. If you can only find out just what you are to do, you can do it perfectly easy." Such a rule will never take any soldier through the battle of life. Let me say, rather, that if you find your work is "perfectly easy," if it requires no effort, if it does not call upon you to do more to-day than you were able to do yesterday, you are in the wrong place.

No growth nor development is possible to the man or woman whose task is always within present powers. Phillips Brooks issued a stirring call for progress in power and achievement when he said, "Do not pray for easy lives; pray to be stronger men. Do not pray for tasks equal to your powers; pray for powers equal to your tasks." Every real success, whether in the large things of national life, or in the cramped routine of a household, has been won after a soul-testing struggle against difficulties. It is only "through labor and painful effort, by grim energy and resolute courage, that we move on to better things." In such a courageous fight, "making prodigious efforts to do more than we can do," the strength grows invincible, the powers increase, our place broadens, our work is exalted, the crown of the victor is won.

With sure conviction that our chosen work is right, that we are in the place we ought to be, nothing need shake us or turn away our eyes from the goal. Even defeat cannot hold us back for more than a moment. "Robbed, starved, defeated, fallen, wide astray—On with what strength I have! Back to the way!"

Do we hear a clear call summoning us, "Friend, come up higher?" Is our right place yonder in the radiant distance? Are we determined to move on to better things? Then no difficulties need frighten us; no "prodigious efforts" will be too great if we are sure of our calling; and if we believe when we "pray for powers equal to our tasks," the power will come as we faithfully make the effort.

THE LITTLE LAD

WITH fishes small and barley cake,
A lad went forth one day;
And on a mountain by a lake,
Christ met him on his way.

Christ and an hungering multitude,
To which he could give bread.
When his disciples had no food,
One of their number said:

"Master, behold this little lad,
Who hath a scanty store."
"Bring it to me," the Saviour bade.
Oh, wonder! more and more

Increased the meat, the more he gave,
Till all that throng was fed.
Ah! what we give to Christ, we save
And honey-sweet is bread

Which, blessed by him, with his we share.
Lord Jesus, at thy feet
We lay our little with our prayer,
For thy use make it meet!

The Last Hours of Mutsuhito

ALL Japan is mourning to-day. The emperor died soon after midnight, this morning (July 30). There have been bulletins of his condition appearing regularly every few hours for the last ten days. The old custom was to keep all such things concealed from public knowledge. Even recently, it has been thought that the death of prominent public men was not announced until some days after it really occurred.

So, when reports of the critical illness of the emperor were given out some days ago, many people thought that he was already dead, and that the bulletins were given out simply to prepare people for the real news. But it soon became apparent that a new policy was being followed, the policy of taking the whole empire into confidence in regard to the emperor's condition. In fact, the pendulum swung so far the other way that the bulletins recorded symptoms and treatments that would hardly be given to the public in an American paper.

During these days of critical illness, the nation has been watching at the bedside, and we read that the emperor occupied a bed three feet high in the center of apartments furnished otherwise in Japanese style. The cars that skirt the palace grounds have gone at slow speed all these days. The fire-gongs have been silenced, for he was always so concerned for his people when the fire-bell sounded. The telephones have been used instead for fire warning. Outside the moat, around the inner palace grounds, is a large gravel plaza, and here multitudes have come to pray for the life of their emperor. Lines of school-girls bowing on the ground in the hot sun, their teachers walking back and forth fanning them; groups and scattered ones, old and young men and women, Buddhist priests, Shinto priests, Christians—many who perhaps never in their hearts prayed before, bowed deep in the dust and offered their prayers. Far into the night the scene was the same, the police directing the people as to where they might bow. Night before last, a photographer let off his flashlight, and the people were so enraged at the desecration that they attacked and killed him.

In spite of the best medical attendance, diabetes carried off the emperor. Though he had reigned forty-five years, he had not completed his sixtieth year of life. He ascended the throne at a time when feudalism was tottering and the Shogun's power waning, and his reign was synonymous with "Meiji," the "era of enlightenment." His evident constant care for the welfare of his people gave him a place in their veneration and affection that can hardly be described.

Mutsuhito, the emperor, is dead. Yoshihito, his son and heir, the new emperor, is almost thirty-three years old. For many years his health was very poor, but he now seems to be in good health. He has three fine little boys. We hope for him as long and beneficent a reign as his father has just closed. (REV.) E. T. IGLEHART.

Our Magazine Club Offer

IN THESE days of literary abundance, the American home that is without a sufficiency of good reading matter is sadly behind the times. Every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should keep in touch with the great movements of the day, and there is no better way in which this can be done than by the regular reading of our leading magazines. In our MAGAZINE COMBINATION OFFER (which appears on another page of this issue) there is an opportunity for every one of our friends not only to gratify his own literary tastes, but to provide the very best and most agreeable and profitable entertainment for the Home Circle during the coming months. By this remarkably economical arrangement, any one or more of your favorite magazines may be secured in combination with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at a greatly reduced price.

We would urge all of our readers to look over the list carefully and take advantage of our money-saving offers. Select your combinations now and send us your order for your magazines for the coming year. Remember, whatever the date of your regular expiration may be, if you send your renewal now, accompanied with your magazine order, your subscription will be advanced a full year from the date of expiration, so you will lose nothing, but be in every way the gainer.

Besides, you will be doing us a real service by renewing at this early date. Later, when the great tide of CHRISTIAN HERALD renewals sets in like a flood, it taxes all the facilities of our extensive Subscription Department. We would gladly relieve the coming pressure by getting in as many early renewals as possible, and we would thank our readers in advance for their cordial co-operation.

War on War

KEIR HARDIE, labor leader in the British House of Commons, who is at present traveling in the United States, tells of a plan being worked out by the labor element of both Great Britain and Germany which suggests the most unique means ever considered for preventing war. "It is proposed," he declares, "to call a general strike in the event of war, a strike of all producing organizations of workingmen, to prevent the furnishing of supplies and munitions of war."

Mr. Hardie points out that the labor element is not to be regarded as unpatriotic, but he believes that the workers are unwilling to go to war where no real principle of patriotism or justice is involved. This is a sort of activity which the labor organizations may well pursue with the utmost vigor. It is quite overwhelming to be confronted with such a revelation of the actual power of labor. What nation could conduct a war when its workers refused to produce the sinews of war?

A King Among the Prophets

EMPEROR WILLIAM of Germany, who has a penchant for supplying lively topics for the consideration of the cabinets of Europe in particular and the rest of the world in general, is credited with a recent utterance which, even from such a source, sounds somewhat apocryphal. The Berlin correspondent of the Tribune writes that in a recent conversation with Karl Von Kroon, the distinguished historian, after an inspection of the Berlin School of History and Literature, the emperor made this extraordinary prediction: "My son will be the last of the emperors. That is why I am bringing him up as I was brought up, under firm discipline. He must be a credit to the house of Hohenzollern and to the thrones that, after his, will cease to be. All the world will be republican within fifty years. Germany will be the last of the empires. It is inevitable!"

Whether this remarkable utterance—if it was really made, which is exceedingly doubtful—was the outcome of a morbid state of mind, due to the emperor's sickness, or was merely a topic flung out to awaken discussion, can only be conjectured. Certainly it does not sound like a genuine utterance from a ruler who has held such firm convictions on the "divine right of kings" as he has held in the past. In May, 1890, in his famous Königsberg speech, he said: "This kingship, by the grace of God, expresses the fact that we Hohenzollerns accept our mission only from heaven and are responsible to heaven for the performance of its duties." Less than a year ago, while unveiling a statue to his father at Aix-la-Chapelle, he said, concerning his inheritance of the imperial crown: "It is a glorious jewel, a jewel from which, under God's protection, rich blessing has gone out to the fatherland." Of the break with Bismarck he said: "It is so ordered for me by God, and it must be borne!" There are doubtless many things credited to the potentates and other high personages that never happened. It was our own Emerson who, nearly half a century ago, wrote: "God said 'I am tired of kings;'" but he wrote in the strain of the philosopher and poet rather than of the political observer, and most people have already forgotten the passage. The likelihood in the present case is that whatever Emperor William really did say to Historian Von Kroon has acquired its lurid and portentous color at the hands of the Socialistic press of Germany. Even in this progressive age, it is not an easy matter to make a prophet out of a ruling monarch, although we have sound Scripture warrant for it, on one occasion at least, as in the case of Saul, who was found among the prophets at Gilgal, prophesying with them.

Light at Evening Time

IT WAS a wonderful thing which the prophet Zechariah predicted. How startling it would be if, when the twilight shadows were falling deeper and deeper, when the silent woods seemed in a slumberous trance, and the distant hills showed purple against the soft crimson, with a sudden burst the light of midday were to spread around! Yet something like that is signified by this symbolic word of promise, given first to the Church of God, but also for individual believers, that in their experience, in their day, "At evening time it shall be light." The figure scarcely needs interpretation. We know it means that great and signal blessing shall come just when it is least expected—when hopes have perished one by one, and the very last seems ready to die. Surely most Christians who have gone far on the way have proved the truth. How often when things were almost at the blackest a strange, unearthly light has come stealing through the gloom, and the heart that could bear no more has found a wonderful support, a strong consolation. Did you never feel, with something like surprise, that, now the worst had come, you were less crushed than your friends expected you to be—than you yourself would have thought you must be? The sunshine was breaking through. It was still the twilight, but the distant horizon you could see the dawn of serener days. You had found, in a word, the fulfilment of God's gracious promise, "At evening time it shall be light."

Waste in Municipalities

THAT official graft has become a national evil of huge dimensions is made evident by the disclosures that are now taking place, not only in New York but in a number of other cities. It is a familiar saying that a State or municipality usually gets the kind of government which it deserves since the people themselves have the power to choose between good and bad appointees. It is not correct, however, to assume that public vigilance and conscientious attention to the government will always result in official honesty. The grafter has many ways of evading the law, and some of these are pointed out by Commissioner of Accounts Raymond B. Fosdick, of New York, who lately sent in his resignation to Mayor Gaynor. Mr. Fosdick lets in the light on various forms of municipal mismanagement and corruption which are difficult to reach. New York's budget for the current year is $190,000,000; yet in spite of this gigantic sum lying at disposal for necessary expenditures, the public treasury is always so low that the metropolis is unable to care for its eighty thousand school children on part time; it cannot afford enough inspectors for the city's food supply, nor can it devote the necessary money to provide an efficient ambulance service or proper hospital facilities, and its jails and workhouses and bakeries are shamefully unsanitary. The public money of our great cities, he declares, is recklessly wasted. "The average municipality in its disbursements is like a man who spends 50 per cent. of his income with the lavish prodigality of a drunken sailor. His money flows through his fingers like sand or is abstracted from his pockets." Mr. Fosdick indicates, as the initial cause of all this waste, the prevailing methods of appropriating money without sufficient knowledge and information concerning the real cost of the work in hand. Coal should be bought with reference to heat value in thermal heat units and not for bulk; oats should be subjected to a laboratory test instead of being accepted on off-hand judgment. The same criticism affects supplies for almost every kind needed by a municipality. Road-making is a fruitful field for official waste, and appropriations are usually granted without determining the cost by any known standard or modern method of estimating labor and material. He suggests that every municipality should have a Bureau of Efficiency for the double purpose of avoiding extravagant expenditures and of getting substantial value for the people's money.

General Notes

—EMPEROR WILLIAM is suffering from an attack of muscular rheumatism and influenza, accompanied by chills and swelling of the right side of the neck. All his engagements have been temporarily canceled and he is confined to his room at the palace in Potsdam.

—GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH'S eldest daughter, Mrs. Catherine Booth-Clibborn (known as La Maréchale), is planning to come to the United States this fall or winter. Arrangements for her meetings are being made by the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, to which communications from churches and other organizations should be sent.

—POSTMASTER-GENERAL HITCHCOCK has been deluged with complaints over the provision in the Post Office Appropriation Bill prohibiting first and second-class post offices from keeping open on Sunday, the writers holding that it would prevent the prompt delivery of mail matter and thus produce a very serious effect. Mr. Hitchcock issued a statement in answer to these complaints, pointing out that lock boxes will be accessible on Sundays as usual, that special mail will be delivered, that mail for newspapers and hotels will be delivered, and that emergency letters will be sorted out on that day. The only mail affected by the new law will be that received at the post offices on Sunday and hitherto sorted out on that day for distribution to lock boxes.

—THE GRAFT investigation in New York has had some surprising developments. It has been shown that a majority of the gambling houses which were raided are again in full operation. A list of all the gambling resorts in the city, with the names of the property owners, is in the hands of District Attorney Whitman. Subpœnas will be issued for the owners to appear before the grand jury and the case against them will be pushed rigorously, regardless of wealth, influence or social position. Prior to August 28, two of the men believed to have been among the actual assassins of Rosenthal—"Gyp the Blood" and "Lefty Louie"—were still at large. It is surmised that one of them at least is hidden away in New York. The gambling house of Webber (who is now in jail charged with complicity in the murder of Rosenthal and who furnished the money for the "get-away") was raided on August 26, and one man, who was in charge of the place, was arrested. It was in full blast at the time and has been so ever since the murder.

Funeral of General Booth

THE body of General Booth lay in state in Congress Hall, London, several days, and two or three hundred thousand persons passed by the bier and took a last look at the nerable hero and said to him "Farewell." The rrow for the dead evangelist among the laboring asses was keen, and it was an impressive scene to e the men marching bareheaded through Con- ess Hall, many of them carrying their tool-bags. nere was a moving scene when Mrs. Booth- ellberg, Chief of the Salvation Army of Denmark, me into the hall with her family, who took places side the catafalque and sang a consecration mn. Many wreaths were sent, including beauti- l ones by the Queen Mother Alexandra and the mperor of Germany. The Queen Mother's wreath re the inscription: "To the emory of General Booth, to hom this whole nation owes n eternal debt of gratitude r the services he rendered to ffering humanity. [Signed] LEXANDRA." On Sunday me- orial services were held orning, afternoon and night, ongress Hall being taxed to s capacity at each service. he formal funeral services ere held in the mammoth lympia Hall Wednesday ght, and were conducted by rigadier Wood and Pastor ake. Forty bands played andel's Dead March in Saul," and to this accompani- ent the body was brought to the hall by a procession of alvationists of all ranks and both sexes, bearing the flags the nations they repre- nted. The flag unfurled by eneral Booth on Mount Cal- ary was displayed during the rvice. The hall was too large for speakers to be eard, and the service consisted mainly of hymns, rayers, Scripture readings and quotations from e deceased, which were thrown upon screens by nterns. There were present at the service be- veen six and seven thousand soldiers of the Salva- on Army. On Thursday the burial was at Abney ark Cemetery, where Bramwell Booth, the new eneral of the Salvation Army, read the burial ser- ice, and Miss Eva Booth, Commander of the Army the United States, made an address. And thus as laid away one of the greatest religious leaders modern times. The secular press has wisely ommended the practical humanitarian side of Gen- al Booth's movement. He was like his Lord in it. ut a keen vision of God and eternal things was e characteristic of both his wife and himself. hey were so anxious to do their duty by the suffer- g and fallen here because they were so certain of e other life in their souls. Whatever they did for eople's bodies, they never left any doubt about the act that it was the salvation of their souls at which ey were aiming. When we think of the blessed- ess of this saint and of the earthly immortality of is influence, we call to mind these words:

Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: s, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors: d their works do follow them. (Rev. 14: 13.)

Martyr to Medical Science

THE other night at the Georgetown University Hospital, Post Assistant Surgeon T. B. McClin- c of the United States Public Health and Marine Hospital Service died of Rocky Mountain "spotted ever," a martyr to the cause of medical science. ne of the foremost specialists in this deadly mal- dy, which he had virtually eradicated from the itter Root Valley in Montana, it was the irony of ate that Dr. McClintic should succumb to the dis- ase. Until recent years little has been known of he deadly tick of the Bitter Root Valley, whose bite ives spotted fever, which kills 70 per cent. of those ho have it. The young doctor was sent by the gov- rnment to Montana to co-operate with the State uthorities to eradicate the insect and the disease. fter two years of investigation and tireless service e succeeded in so destroying the mites that infested he ground-squirrels, chipmunks, woodchucks and ine-squirrels, and consequently the deadly disease hey carry, that no case of the spotted fever had ap- eared for the year till he himself was bitten and ied as the result. Dr. McClintic was thirty-nine ears old and had been connected with the Public Health and Marine Hospital Service for fifteen years. He was a native of Warm Springs, Va., and a graduate of the University of Virginia. He leaves a young wife, the bride of only a few weeks. From a human standpoint we cannot understand the providence that takes away so good and useful a man. But in his short career he did the work of a thousand lives in beneficent service to others and in his martyrdom to science. In dying that others might live he only imitated his Master, and of him also it could be said:

He saved others: himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27: 42.)

Successful Trade School Work

THE annual exhibition of the Manhattan Trade School in East Twenty-third Street, New York City, was held the other afternoon, and charmed the hundreds of people who attended it. One girl in the novelty department had made a remarkable array of cloth-covered boxes. Another had excelled in the making of shirtwaist and handkerchief boxes. In three months the girls advanced from plain sewing to plain and advanced millinery. Some of the hats would command the respect of a professional milliner as to taste and cost. The dresses on exhibition were made by the girls in the last month and served as a final examination. Each pupil designed her own pattern, selected her own material and turned out a finished article. There are 375 pupils in the school, and 200 on the waiting list. The trade school is one of the most important departments of our popular school system. It is strange that it should have taken this length of time to discover the fact. This feature is as necessary as the rudiments of an education are absolutely necessary for practical success in any calling. But there is no reason why the ideal work cannot be carried on even better when mixed with the practical in the schools for the proper equipment for life's duties. Professor Maxwell, superintendent of the New York City schools, has made a pronounced declaration in favor of the manual training feature from the lowest to the highest grade. He thinks it should begin the moment a child enters the school. He suggests the school workshop, the school kitchen, and the school playground as important means of development for mind and body. The question of self-support is all-important as an economic, moral and even religious question. The manual training feature cannot be introduced too soon into all the schools of the land in the city and country. It will aid the coming generation materially in obeying the commandment:

Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work. (Ex. 20: 9.)

Earthquake Kills 3,000

RECENT reports reveal far greater damage from the earthquake in the Sea of Marmora than at first supposed. J. Cornell Tarler, second secretary of the United States embassy, and the special mission of four physicians on the board report that at least three thousand persons were killed outright, and six thousand more seriously injured. Some of the villages could not be approached, so foul was the odor of the dead bodies among the ruins. The people are stunned by their calamity and are sitting about in groups in despair. The Turkish transport Bezzm-y-Alem has been converted into a hospital ship and anchored off the coast to care for the worst cases. The Red Crescent Society, the Greek philanthropic society, the American Red Cross and other societies are doing their part to alleviate the suffering. Such catastrophes reveal the severe side of nature and call upon men to regard the injunction of the Master:

Be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. (Matt. 24: 44.)

Birds Destroy a Church

NOW and then we read of a thunder storm with lightning striking a church and killing some of the congregation, or of a wind turning a church building over, or of a fire burning it up. But a more curious form of destruction is that of a church building at Oak Hill, in Belmont County, Ohio, effected by the assault of an army of woodpeckers. These birds had hammered so many holes in different parts of the building, especially in the sides, that the officers met and resolved to repair and put an end to the damage. It is not unlikely that the birds had been busy for a good while, and that the authorities had been careless of the matter, not thinking that the damage would be serious till their attention was stirred, and the real danger recognized. Whatever damage the destructive birds may have done to the country church building, there are many churches in the rural districts and in the cities that suffer from the acts of human destroyers, the scandalmongers of society, who hammer ugly holes in people's good name, and feast their long sharp tongues on the insects of slander. Few causes of discontent and open rupture in churches have been greater than gossips and slanderers who, having found some imagined or real fault or sin, run swiftly to proclaim it publicly by telling every one "in strictest confidence," with hypocritical caution, "Don't tell anybody for the world," knowing that the story will go like the wind. Such persons would not break a safe and steal money; they would not burn their neighbor's house; but they do a damage which is worse and harder to repair—they destroy a good name. Fortunately character is so much stronger than reputation that it can stand the assaults of a vile tongue; but a church organization cannot afford the damage caused by the long-billed, sharp-tongued, insect-fed birds of slander. The apostle thus truly and powerfully describes this tongue of scandal:

It is set on fire of hell. (James 3: 6.)

THE BLIND WOMAN OF ALGIERS

BY REV. J. C. HARTZELL, M. E. BISHOP OF AFRICA, AND WALTER J. YATES, PH. D

The Blind Woman at the Foot of Her Stairs

The Junior Division of the Girls' Class of Moslem Kabyles

The Street of the Blind Woman, Algiers

A HOLE in the wall, and a very small hole at that. You would hardly believe it possible that a human being could cook, eat, sleep and live in such a place. It was scarcely five feet long, four feet wide and four feet high. The only opening into it was a doorway two and a half feet square. That had for years been the only home of the blind woman of Algiers. It was not clean, neither was she. It was long enough for her to lie down or sit up in, for she was small, very poor, and was getting old. She was nothing but a Kabyle woman, a Mohammedan. She had never been particularly good-looking. Being no longer young, she had no value in the Moslem world and no place in any other. Where or how she lived mattered nothing to any one else, and but little to her, when our ladies found her.

This was in the city of Algiers, in that wonderland of North Africa. Not in the beautiful, new French Quarter, with its wide streets and fine buildings, but in the old Arab town, with narrow alleys and ancient crowded houses, foul with the unremoved filth of years. The ladies of our mission had long searched for a house in the native quarter which they could hire for the purpose of holding meetings with native women and classes for girls. They finally secured the one where the blind woman lived. I was asked to visit it and take some photographs. This was a most extraordinary thing, for a man to be allowed to visit the apartments of the women and take their photographs. The privilege was secured by each of the married women asking the consent of her husband, assuring him that there would be no cause for jealousy since I had gray hair, and so must be an old man.

The street was reached after passing through a maze of bazaars, alleys and little squares. It was a steep flight of stone steps between high walls, having here and there a heavy nail-studded door and an occasional window high above the walk. A knock on the door was answered after a short wait by a timid hail from within, of: "Who is it?" then another wait while hurrying feet went to carry the message. A second call from within to make certain that all was right on our side, and our door opened cautiously for me to enter, but not for my guide. Though he was a Christian Kabyle, he was a man, a young man! Under no circumstances could he be admitted to the women's apartments of a native house.

From the small entrance hall I passed into the court, paved with stone slabs, from which rooms opened on the four sides. Some were on the level of the court, and others were six feet or more below and were reached by stone steps. On one side of the court was a stone well-curb from which water was obtained for the use of the families. In one corner was a stone stairway leading to the flat roof. Half way up the stairs was the opening into the blind woman's room. The sill to the opening was breast high from the stairs. This could be closed by a tight wooden shutter on hinges which would shut out all light and air. I didn't go in. I couldn't, without bumping my head against the stone roof and curling up my legs. Yet she had lived there day and night for years before the ladies of our mission found her. This is Moslem poverty. Now she has a larger room near the head of the staircase, where she can stand upright. She has ample room for her sleeping rug on the clean floor and for her simple cooking and eating utensils. She is no longer in daily danger of starvation, if the uncertain gifts from street begging should fail. Our ladies have found some Christian friends who pay her rent and help her to necessary food.

But there is more to be seen here. Go up the stairs and out upon the roof. Here are two rooms in each of which a family lived when our folks took possession. Neither one is eight feet square, yet there were four persons in each family. In the right hand one, a native woman was sick and dying. Kneeling by the rug on which she lay, our women told her in the Kabyle tongue of Jesus and his love, his care for women and the hope of heaven. It was all absolutely new to her. She listened, understood, believed, and with a light in her eyes, never there before, and a smile on her face, she passed into the other life, looking for a better house which should be her eternal home.

A Group of Algerian Kabyle Women

Every room opening from the courtyard, whether above or below the ground level, was occupied by a family. There were fifteen separate families living in this house when o people took it. The filth w incredible to an America and altogether indescribab The first thing done was get rid of nine families, th to "clean up." The dirt d out filled a room high up u til it could be carried awa Six of the more cleanly a peaceable families still re rooms in the house. None of those under grou are allowed to be occupied. Some of the larg rooms are reserved for the meetings of the Kaby women and the classes of girls connected with t mission.

We are impressed with the fact that this is t East, and we begin to comprehend how it is th these people when they come to New York ci crowd together without complaint, in a way th shocks our Western ideas. Customs are slow change. On a street not far from our house, I sa a family one morning rousing from sleep. The were six of them in a room about eight feet squa four steps below the street and wide open to th view of all passers. They slept on the stone floo each wrapped in a dirty blanket, which was th principal garment worn by day. If they wash at all, it would be at the hydrant at the street co ner. If they had any breakfast, it was cooked simple fashion in that same room and eaten sittir on the floor, the steps, or on the sidewalk. Privac is unknown. Privation is so universal that passes unnoticed.

The Kabyle girls who come to us are divided in two classes, the younger and older. It is impossible to hold them after they are eleven or twelv years old, as they then put on the veil and are soc married, and then their husbands jealously refu to let them go out in public, or be taught. Th older women and some mothers with children con to the women's meetings. Unlike the Arabs an Moors, these Kabyle women are not usually veile They are, without exception, desperately poor an densely ignorant. The ladies of the mission talk t them of Jesus and try to teach them the simp things of a pure life. They listen to their storie of hardship, cruelty and hopeless sorrow, the con mon lot of all Moslem women. All are pitifu some are heart-breaking. At the close of the mee ing a saucerful of meal is given each woman tha she may have at least once a week a fair feed fo herself and child. Each wraps it in the corner o her mantle, as she has no other way to carry it.

This is Moslem womanhood and these are Ka byles. Now, a Kabyle is not an Arab, but is a de scendant from the old white stock which people these lands ages before the Arabs conquered it i the seventh century. They have never forgotten wh they are. They were obliged by their Arab con querors to accept the Koran and become Moslems They did so outwardly, but to this day the wome all bear on their foreheads an indelible blue mar of the cross, put there at birth in memory of thei ancient faith. The first settlers of North Afric were of a white race called Libyans. Later cam the Phœnicians from the eastern shores of th Mediterranean, who mixed with them and becam the ruling race. Conquered by the Romans, ther

SO SHALL THE PERIL PASS

BY ALICE J. WHITTIER

SHANGHAI, CHINA

WHILE in the tents of Shem,
On the far twilight hem
Of earth's dark region,
Found I great lands and fair,
Found I much people there;
It dwelt in earth and air
Whose name is Legion.

Under each spreading tree
Shrine and pagodas see,
Fair hilltops pointing.
Demons of stone or clay;
Tablets to mem'ries gray;
Priests, gods, by every way,
Of man's anointing.

Evil as good did reign;
Love was an empty name;
Deep did I sorrow.
Ruled by a robber band,
Fear brooded o'er the land;
Yet saw I, far and grand,
Shapes of to-morrow.

Lor, toiling through the years,
Patient in hopes or fears,
A little leaven—
Human indeed were they;
Love used the faulty clay;
Strong did they hew the way
Toward God and heaven.

Oft was that toiling spurned;
Backward the nation turned,
Back to their sages.
Plumbline knew not the place;
Gain was the saving grace;
Weak grows a mighty race
Buried in ages.

Bound by an evil creed,
By ignorance and greed,
This was their token.
Famine walked lean and bare;
Floods swept the harvests fair;
Plague tainted foul the air;
Their pride was broken.

Then rose War's horrid head,
Strewing the land with dead,
Dumb in its terror.
But from the evil throng
Of weaklings came the strong
Young men to battle wrong.
Truth grappled Error.

Up rose the people then;
Tore they the robber den
Down from its station.
Here where the dragon flew,
Flung out a banner new;
Hope in its rainbow hue
Hangs o'er a nation!

Dawn comes across the night:
Saw I a wondrous sight
In a strong city—
"God save our President!"
(God grant 'twas truly meant!)
Ne'er be that fair sign rent;
May all hearts pity.

For, with her garments torn,
Faint, weak, and newly born,
See China pleading.
Turns she to other lands;
Turns she with helpless hands,
Where truth appealing stands:
"Wise men we're needing."

Come, if thy Lord be All,
Thou and thy message small,
This and no other.
Preach thou One God to them;
Live thou the Christ for them;
Teach thou the love of men;
Love thou thy brother.

So shall Thy Kingdom come,
So shall the land be won,
To Christ confessing.
Yea, Truth shall make them free;
White, white, the harvest see;
China shall never be
"Peril"—but blessing!

SEPTEMBER JOYS AT MONT-LAWN

THE glorious tints of late summer, in golden red and russet brown, are giving finishing touches these days to the beauty of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. To those who have had the privilege of visiting the "Children's Paradise" this year, there will come back the memory of the bright faces of happy childhood brought away for a time from the squalor, the sorrow and the sin of the great city.

Many of our readers who have never seen the home, although they have read much about it, are keenly alive to its interests. Their feelings are freely expressed in the letters that reach us by every day's mail. M. M., Cedarville, Ohio, an old lady of seventy-one, with slender income, sends 25 cents for the work. Mrs. M. B., Pasadena, Calif., encloses $3 "to give a poor waif a ten days' outing in the pure air among the green fields." "With heartiest wishes for the success of the work," Mrs. J. O'H. also sends $3. A like sum is sent by a Carthage, N. Y., reader to send "a little girl to Mont-Lawn." From the Hinman Hollow (Milford, N. Y.) Sunday school comes a contribution of $3 "permit some poor waif to breathe the fresh air in the country for ten days." Miss Edsall's class in the Sunday school of the First Presbyterian Church, Palisades Park, N. J., sends $12, which will provide an outing for four little waifs. Miss H. L. Alexander, N. Y., ($10) writes: "The cause is one that reaches the heart, and I want to do even a small share toward making poor little children happier in the ideal Children's Paradise." "I wish it were as many hundred," writes Mrs. D. L. H., Fort Churchill, Nev., who sends $5. Mrs. N. F. Daniel-son's Sunday school class of ten little girls at Boone, Col., collected $3 which the good teacher sends to provide an outing for some little boy or girl. These golden-hearted little Sunday school maids earned the money which they now give so generously. Mr. and Mrs. Danielson added $3 to the gift, thus making two tenement waifs happy. N. B. Weir, New Plymouth, Ida., sends $3 from the little girl members of Class No. 12, First Congregational Church of that town. They wish their beneficiary to be a little tenement girl. The "Sunshine Tryst Club" of Bristol, R. I., through Miss R. M. Blaisdell, treasurer, sends a gift of $3. The Sunday school of the Congregational Church of West Cornwall, Conn., sends a birthday gift of $3 from the junior members "to take care of one dear child at Mont-Lawn." "I have one little girl dead and one living," writes Mrs. N. L. S., Hobart, Okla., and she kindly sends in their names with $3 to provide an outing for a child. "God bless the old HERALD and its work," writes Mrs. J. H. S., Drain, Ore., who sends $5; "I have taken it for twenty years and expect to take it as long as I live." A number of dear children at Bayshore, N. Y., held a fair and now, through Mrs. S. A. B., they generously send the proceeds, $43.58, to help the Fresh Air Fund. The young people who did so splendidly are Evelyn Weeks, Constance Benjamin, Sarita Morse, Martha Tucker, Katharine Fanning, Virginia Weeks and Elizabeth Corwin. Miss M. F. Shaw, of Walton, N. Y., sends $10.20, a collection from her Sabbath school class. Three friends in Sunbury, Pa., send $3 through Mr. Geo. B. Remensnyder. A birthday offering of $3 comes from the children of the primary department of the Presbyterian Sunday school, Livingston Manor, N. Y.

The following recent contributions are acknowledged. All gifts for Mont-Lawn should be addressed "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York."

THE HELPING POWER OF GOD

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

WE ARE about to study again one of "the dear old stories," the feeding of the multitude of five thousand by the Lord Jesus. It is so familiar we shall need only to state the points in brief:

1. Jesus and his apostles after many days of teaching and healing sought rest at Bethsaida, a "desert place," not a barren place, because much grass was there. It was what we call "the country."

2. The people, seeing Jesus and his disciples depart by boat, went themselves the land way, and reached Bethsaida before Jesus did.

3. The multitude numbered five thousand men, besides women and children.

4. Jesus, though he had come to rest, devoted himself to teaching and healing the great throng.

5. When evening was drawing on, the apostles suggested to Jesus that the people should be sent away where they could buy bread.

6. Jesus, not willing that they should be sent away hungry, told the apostles to give them food.

7. The only food that could be found was in the basket of a boy: five loaves and two small fishes (John 6: 8-9). Jesus said, "Bring it to me."

8. The people were told to sit down in companies of fifty and a hundred on the grass (Mark 6: 39, 40).

9. Jesus took the loaves and the fishes in his hands and blessed them. He broke them in pieces and gave them to his apostles to pass to the people sitting on the grass.

10. The bread and the fish multiplied in the blessed hands of Jesus more than a thousand fold, for what was enough for five people in the end filled the more than five thousand.

11. After the feeding the people departed by the land way to their homes.

12. The apostles departed by boat for Capernaum. Jesus went alone on the mountain to pray.

How much greater than five thousand are the many millions of people in the world whom God is feeding day by day, and the countless birds and fish and animals. This great miracle of world-feeding began in the Garden of Eden when God said to Adam and Eve: "I have given you every herb yielding seed, and every tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for food. And to every beast of the earth, and to every bird of the heavens, and to everything that creepeth on the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for food" (Gen. 1: 29, 30).

And afterwards God made a promise to Noah concerning daily food, and he put a rainbow seal upon the promise. Read Gen. 8: 22 and 9: 1, 13.

But some one asks, "Why, then, do famines occur, as in China and in other lands?" People who give so much of their money, as CHRISTIAN HERALD readers do, have a right to ask this question, and have it answered. First, it will be found that men, and not God, are usually accountable for famines. They deforest the land and disturb the rainfall, so that their country becomes a barren wilderness, as is largely the case in China, or they use the soil for pernicious plants, as opium in India and China. Sometimes men put in their ruthless hands and turn the course of rivers, so that once fruitful lands become the beds of salt seas, as in our own land. But under the blessing of God in other parts of the world the harvests are so increased that there is enough and to spare, so that abundant supplies may be sent to famine regions. Never can we forget the thrill of joy we felt one day in Nagasaki, Japan, when we were told that the United States transport Buford had just come into port laden with flour, the gift of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for the famine sufferers in China. We were at the time addressing a company of Christian workers, but the meeting was speedily brought to a close, and we all went down to inspect the cargo. This brings us to say that God overrules the famines in such a way as to make them result in wonderful harvests of love and good will to all human kind. Still he keeps his promise that the world shall be fed. God has been unceasingly at it since the time of Adam and Eve; for forty years he fed the host of Israel with bread from heaven, the daily manna, and when they asked for a change of diet he gave them flesh (quails) in the evenings (Ex. 16). He fed Elijah by ravens as messengers, and afterwards by increase of the meal in the widow's barrel and oil in her cruse (I. Kings 17: 1-15). And God fed Elijah even when he was a fugitive from duty (I. Kings 19: 1-8). From that time until now God has regarded the hungry and fed them, even whole asylums of orphan children, as Müller's in England, where all food comes in answer to daily prayer.

"I Am the Bread of Life"

These are the words of Jesus selected for our Golden Text. They teach us that Jesus gives us bread for our souls as well as for our bodies. He, himself, is the bread of the soul. He spoke these words in Capernaum the day after he had fed the multitude at Bethsaida. What occurred between

"Jesus took the loaves, and when he had given thanks he distributed to them that were set down" will be the subject of our lesson for October 6.

The throng that gathered around Jesus in Capernaum after his return from Bethsaida was even greater than before, because several boatloads of people from Tiberias, half way down the side of the sea, had heard about the wonderful feeding of the multitude, and they came to Bethsaida, thinking Jesus would still be there, but when they heard that he had returned to Capernaum, they came to that city and swelled the throng (John 6: 23, 24). As they gathered about Jesus, he read their thoughts as though they had been an open book. He told them, as well as many who had been fed the day before, that they had come to get more loaves. He did not repeat the miracle of the loaves and fishes, but instead he offered them living bread, as he had offered living water to the woman at the well of Samaria, and had told her that "whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst" (John 4: 14). When Jesus spoke in Capernaum about the living bread, he said, "If any man eat of this bread he shall live forever." But, alas! those who heard him did not understand him. They thought that he was promising to give free bread to all of the people as the Roman emperors were sometimes accustomed to do, and they were ready to take him for their king. But when Jesus continued teaching them about the Bread which was his own flesh that he would give for the life of the world (John 6: 52), their hearts were turned against him, and they became his bitter opponents. We love to think there were some that day who did understand him, and who from that day had no more soul-hunger.

Bless, then, the truth, dear Lord,
To me, to me,
As thou didst bless the bread
By Galilee.
Then shall all bondage cease,
All fetters fall;
And I shall find my peace,
My all in all.

MARY A. LATHBURY.

"Them that had need of healing he cured" (L 9: 11). Among them were the blind, the lame, deaf, the palsied and the lepers. We could that we might see a list of how many of these ferent kinds of sufferers he healed that day be the feeding of the multitude occurred. We n believe that he stopped the healing only when t were no more to be healed, for all had been m well.

God is just as surely healing the world to-da he is feeding the world. Jesus healed by mira for two reasons: first, that the power of Go him might be made manifest; second, becaus his time there was no medical profession that trained physicians, as we consider a physi trained and qualified for his high calling. We call the case of the woman who had been sick twelve years, "who had spent all her living on sicians, and could not be healed of any" (Luk 43). She simply touched the border of Jesus' ment and was healed. At his touch blind men ceived sight; at his word, those not in his prese were cured of fevers and delivered from dem he put his fingers in the ears of the deaf, straightway they heard; he touched the tongu the dumb and the bond was loosed (Mark 7: 34) his word, lep were healed. But work of the hea Christ is greater day than it was w he was upon ea We read of only persons that w healed who did come into his im diate presence — centurion's serva and the daughter the Syrophenic woman. Altho throngs follow him, the number people who ca close to him small, for Palest was a little le hardly larger t our smallest St and too, the time his healing was ited to a little o three years. Let compare with th conditions the th sands of hospi that have been tablished where his Name is spok where cures are wrought hourly, momentarily, cause his blessing is upon them. Without Ch they could do nothing. When people trouble th selves and their friends with such questions "Why does Jesus not cure the sick to-day? Is power less than when he was on the earth?" t have failed to grasp the larger work which he is complishing through the revelations of scie Indeed, we must believe that results which c from asylums for the insane, institutions for feeble-minded, for the blind and deaf and du etc., can be accounted for only by the fact that healing Christ illumines the judgment and streng ens the hands of those who are his help Christ is to-day healing the world just as sure as is feeding the world. If we want a proof of t let us take the healing that is constantly going in our bodies. God is with us to heal. That sev cut which you received in your hand a few we ago, you hardly see the place now. Did you heal Did it heal itself, or did God do it? A man fell the icy steps and broke three of his ribs; the ph cian came and tightly bandaged him, leaving to do the rest, and to-day he is as strong as e You fell, and got an ugly bruise upon your face; first it was dark and swollen, but little by little swelling went down, and slowly the delicate c came back, and now you would not know that had ever had such a trouble. Who was your de erer? And God is doing such things constantly the hundreds of millions of his creatures in parts of the world, and for the birds and bea which he has created, for they too receive injur And yet there are some who idly think "his arm shortened that he cannot help."

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Lieutenant Colonel John H. Compton, in command of four oops, is stationed at Fort Sullivan among the foothills of the ig Horn Mountains. The country is in a state of feverish nrest, as the Sioux and Cheyenne Indians are on the war-path, nd many settlers have been massacred. Colonel Compton's ife, Mary, and their little four-year-old daughter, Ethel Ben-n, are with him at the fort. There are several other women, ives of officers, and Mrs. Compton's pretty Irish maid, Molly cNeil, who dearly loves the little girl. Molly is very popular ith the soldiers, but gives her preference to Private Danny eagher of Troop B. One day an alarm is given, the officer of he guard reports Indians on the hills to the westward, and he troops are ordered to get ready. In the meantime little thel has wandered from the enclosure, the Indians see her, and he chief swoops down on horseback and carries her off. With rantic haste the soldiers pursue the marauders, but the colonel nows his men are outclassed in numbers and there are still women to protect in the fort, so he causes the recall o be sounded. An investigation is held s to how the child got out of the rounds. Private Meagher confesses was his fault in not guarding the gate, ut Molly McNeil takes the blame on erself, saying she tempted "the bhoy." he Indians put up a flag of truce, and olonel Compton and his officers meet hree of their leaders. These propose o give up the child in return for the ort. The proposition is haughtily re-ected, and death is threatened to the ttle one. Meagher is put under arrest nd is to be courtmartialed. In an in-erview with the colonel he suggests hat as he will be condemned to death nyway, he be allowed to try to rescue iss Ethel by seeming to desert to the ndians. This is agreed upon, but Mar-ett, an old scout and hunter, who does ot know of the agreement, hears the arefully missimed fire from the fort, nd seeing the deserter running, fires nd wounds him. Meagher falls, but is icked up and carried away by the ndians. Marnett enters the fort and earns of his mistake. He and Lieuten-nt Hadden then get away to a distant elegraph station and summon rein-orcements, which arrive under the com-nand of Colonel Huntley. Colonel ompton is given command of the en-ire Fourteenth Cavalry, and the War epartment orders a winter campaign gainst the Indians. Leaving two com-anies of infantry to garrison the fort, olonel Compton and his command narch out into the snow-covered moun-ains to search for Chief Dull Knife and is band. After weeks of terrific hard-hips in the rough country and intense old, Colonel Compton and his officers gree, when all the rations are used ex-ept enough to take the regiment back to he fort, that, to save the lives of the en, they should give up the quest. But he men volunteer to go ahead on hort rations. As new plans are being ade, Danny Meagher appears, dressed s an Indian, and reports the hiding-lace of Dull Knife and assures them hat Miss Ethel is safe, well and happy. He returns with a troop, under Lieu-enant Hadden, which is to take a posi-ion on the hills above the Indians' amp. The rest of the regiment, except he sick, frozen and snow-blind, follow, Compton and Marnett leading.

CHAPTER VII

THE HORROR OF THE PASS

FOR hours the gelid troops slowly and painfully plodded up the cañon in the hyperboreal air. Sometimes the icy, snow-covered trail, not a good one under the most favorable conditions, narrowed so that it was necessary for the long column to pass over it in single file. Frequently they crossed from one side of the cañon to the other on huge boulders lying in the bed of the stream, which would have been absolutely impassable for the horses had not the space between been filled with masses of ice beneath which the low torrent ran. Fortunately when they got well within the cañon it stopped snowing, the wind died down, and about ten o'clock at night the full moon burst from the clouds and gave them abundance of light, save where the towering walls of the pass, sometimes rising several thousand feet, threw the trail far beneath into deep shadow.

In spite of their precautions, there were many accidents. Horses stumbled and fell into the river, carrying men with them. In one instance a trooper was dashed against a wall of rock and killed. Although the wind and snow had both ceased, the cold was intense. Only the most heroic resolution, the most indomitable persistence, animating their otherwise frigid hearts, enabled the troops to sustain it. They plodded along silently, Marnett with the colonel in the lead. Conversation was so painful as to be almost impossible, and speech was only resorted to in direst necessity. The old scout seemed to have an unerring faculty of picking out the most practicable places for the slow advance of the freezing command. Whenever the cañon opened into a little pocket, as it did sometimes, the troops were halted and assembled, stragglers were brought up, and order was restored.

It was one o'clock in the cold, still winter morning when they reached the narrow entrance of the transverse glacial cañon which led to the "hole" where Dull Knife had concealed himself. It was a mere rift in the wall, as if some titanic hand had cleft it with a mighty blade from the lofty rim to the abysmal depth far below. The narrow entrance, scarcely affording passage to a horse and rider, looked grim and terrible. It was, of course, too deep for any light from the moon to penetrate, and seemed like a thin black scar in the face of the ice-bound wall of the pass.

As they listened the dogs barked again. "Gentlemen," said Compton, "Dull Knife!"

No wonder the scouts had passed it by unheeded when they had before examined the cañon. The walls here towered at least fifteen hundred feet above them, and the opening was a mere thread. A closer inspection showed that the lateral cañon also bent sharply about a hundred feet from its intersection with the greater pass, and unless a very careful examination of the spot were made it looked like merely a niche or scarred recess in the face of the mountain.

The main pass was here a little wider than ordinarily, and trees grew on the banks of the stream, which was fortunate for the soldiers, for otherwise they would have been compelled to ford the icy torrent, which would have been difficult, perhaps impossible. Axes had been brought along, and soon four huge pines lay across the brook. By means of this improvised bridge the command presently reached the other side. The strongest troopers under Major Dexter briefly scouted the narrow pass, and returning, reported it was empty. Indeed, all the veteran fighters knew that no Indian on the continent would be abroad on such a night if it could possibly be avoided. The troops were certain they would not be under observation, therefore they cleared a little space in the snow and by means of dry pine branches a huge fire was soon kindled, coffee was made for the men and the horses were watered and given a scanty feeding.

It was two o'clock in the morning when they started, Marnett again in the lead. The new cañon was so narrow, its walls so steep, it ran in such a direction that its interior was almost pitch dark. Fortunately the brook, which ran through it in the spring, summer and fall, had either been dried up before the winter set in, or it had been frozen solid; the snow, too, was as hard as iron, so the going was easier. The black rocks jutting out of the white crest were easily discerned and avoided by the twisting, stumbling, ever mounting column.

There were a dozen places in the winding, turning, climbing trail through the mountains where a dozen men could have held the pass against a thousand; but there were no men there. Dull Knife was confident that his retreat would be undiscovered; he had no idea that there were any troops on earth which would have had the hardihood to struggle up the frost-bound cañon on a night of such deadly cold. Doubtless he felt as safe as if he had been in the fortress of Gibraltar, had he known anything about that famous position. He was to learn before the morning of what the American soldier is capable, and that the polar temperature itself could not congeal him, or his horse, either.

The rare cold grew more and more intense as the trail through the cañon, if such it could be called, mounted gradually upward. They attained a height of 9,000 feet in this narrow pass before they began to descend. Once in it they had to go on; there was nothing else to be done. To stop was to die, to turn back would be to perish miserably; there was salvation in the advance, and nowhere else. They had to seize Dull Knife's camp to get rest, food and fire.

Mechanically, with bent heads, they plodded on, keeping together by a sort of instinctive coherence. Obedient to acquired habit through long years of soldiering. Often they had to dismount and lead their horses for long distances. This relieved the horses and in a measure warmed the men. Only the most heroic care on the part of the officers prevented straggling; benumbed, dazed men sought occasion to drop from their horses and lie down to sleep and die. A few of them did succeed in getting away from the column unobserved in the darkness and were seen no more, but the great majority struggled desperately on. The horrors of that winter march of Compton's men were never forgotten by the army. It was a tale to tell around warm firesides on wild winter nights.

After they had passed the high point and the descent began the temperature grew a little more bearable, but it was still frightfully severe. Conversation was of course practically impossible, yet some there were whose positions and duties compelled them to speak, with frozen lips.

"We must be near," said Marnett to the colonel at last.

He was an unerring judge of distance, and was certain that they must now be close to the place that Meagher had described. The colonel raised his head; he also lifted his hand; those nearest him stopped, and then those farther away; it needed but a suggestion to bring the whole long column which came crowding slowly onward to a halt. The panting horses were too exhausted to move. There was neither shaking of heads, nor pawing of hoofs, nor jangling of bits. Their riders leaned over their saddles as motionless as the cañon walls. The officers slowly crowded to the front near the colonel. Clouds of mist from many breaths of men and animals hung undisturbed above them in the stillness of that ghastly morning.

What had stopped them was soon apparent. In that thin air, in that intense cold, sound carried a long distance. They heard a dog bark! They were near the Indian camp evidently. It was about half past four in the morning. Through a rift in the range they saw the whitish gray of the dawn to the eastward. As they listened the dogs barked again.

"Gentlemen," said Compton, "Dull Knife."

The words seemed to put new vigor in the command. One would have said, watching them reeling down the trail, had such observation been possible, that they were at the last gasp of human endurance. It was a mistake; these men had still some reserve force. The colonel's three words had called it into action.

"Carbines and revolvers!" said Compton.

He loosened his own pistol in its holster and then unslung the carbine that he carried in common with the other officers and men across his shoulder and dropped it lightly in front of him across his saddle. Without a word the men did the same, although his and their hands were so benumbed in spite of the thick fur gloves which all wore that their fingers would scarcely do their work.

"We will jump the village the minute we see it," he continued. "Keep fast the saber until we come close to them. Understand?"

A low hoarse inarticulate growl of assent came from those nearest, and both word and response were passed down the long ranks until the weakest stragglers at the other end heard and were inspired by them.

"I'll ride for'ard to the bend in the pass," said Marnett, pointing ahead about a quarter of a mile, "and see how things lay."

"Go ahead," said the colonel.

Like a white-frosted, rime-covered ghost, Marnett ventured ahead. He dismounted when he reached the bend and plodded out of sight on foot. He was back in a few minutes, meeting the command slowly advancing as he came.

"I couldn't keep them still longer; they were freezing to death," explained the colonel. "We had to move."

Marnett nodded.

"They are there," he said. "The trail breaks sharp to the right an' opens into a beautiful pocket wide enough for the hull regiment to form line. The village is under the north bluff facin' south, an' the pony herd is to the south an' below. Fires are almost out, there's no watch; everybody is in the tepees asleep. They don't dream there's a soldier within a hundred miles of 'em."

"Good!" said the colonel. He turned and rode back along the line; the men had by this time got themselves again into column of fours. "Dexter," said the colonel, stopping at the head of the first battalion, "detach one troop to pass around the village to the left to try to capture the pony herd."

"Captain Emmett," said Dexter, "to you that duty."

"Very good, sir."

"The rest of the battalion will form line the instant they debouch from the pass and ride through the village, driving out the Cheyennes before them; and for God's sake, be careful of the women and children; one of the latter may be my own," said Compton.

"I understand, sir," answered Dexter.

"Don't fire on an Indian wearing a white blanket if you can help it; that will be Meagher."

"We will take good care."

"I know you will, Dexter," said the colonel, riding down toward Calmore's battalion, which brought up the rear.

"God give us luck, sir," cried Dexter after his superior as he rode away.

The instructions to Dexter were repeated to Calmore, save that the latter was directed to hold his rear troop as a reserve to be thrown into action whenever circumstances might determine.

"Close up!" said the colonel. "Let's have no straggling; and now," he continued, raising his voice, "let every man make his peace with God, and then do his best."

There was no cheering, but again the low growl of assent. The colonel reached his place at the head of the line.

"Forward!" he said softly; and the march was at once begun.

The wind was blowing toward them from the camp; they could hear the dogs again. As yet, however, it was desultory barking, for the Indian curs had not yet scented them; what wind was stirring blew in the faces of the soldiers. The trail was now broad and smooth.

"Trot, march!" cried the colonel.

The pace was accelerated; the rapid movement warmed them a little; they went faster; they forgot for a moment the awful, gripping cold; the trot grew more rapid until they reached the bend in the trail and looked down into the valley. The camp and hundreds of tepees lay before them. Faint smoke rose from dying fires here and there among the tents, but not a human soul was visible. They caught sight of a dog slinking from tepee to tepee. Emmett, preserving his column formation, now broke to the left and galloped off toward the pony herd; the rest formed into line in the open on the double quick.

The dogs in the village scented them at last; a wild howl and a furious barking rose here and there; tepee flaps were instantly thrown aside; heads peered out sleepily, to awaken into full life and action in a second.

"Forward!" roared Compton, with a sudden access of lost vigor.

THE Judicial Committee of the British Privy Council has decided the Quebec marriage question involving the papal decree of Ne Temere in favor of the Province of Quebec and against the recent proposed legislation of the Dominion Parliament, which undertook to provide that no law or canonical decree or custom of any province should invalidate any marriage performed by any person competent to perform a marriage ceremony. The Lord Chancellor, in delivering judgment, said that the proposed bill was beyond the powers of the Dominion Parliament.

A BACKYARD PLAYGROUND MISSION

THE new superintendent of "Faith Mission" opened the door of the Sunday-school room and went in. It was his first Sunday as director of the affairs of this little West Side oasis of religious life, and the door had not closed behind him when he was greeted by twenty-three children of various sizes and ages, most of whom were expert at the shrill whistles and long-drawn recalls they produced for his edification. Even the baker's dozen or so that had been lending main force assistance to the pianist broke away to have a try at the quality of nerves possessed by Mr. C. D. Usinger, who had come from the Bowery Mission to this neglected field on the West Side.

It is almost on the edge of this unsavory neighborhood known as "Hell's Kitchen" that Faith Mission is located, and Mr. Usinger went to take up his work in October, 1903. He had been converted about two years before coming to the Bowery Mission.

For nine years Mr. Usinger has devoted his energies to the building up of a stalwart mission work in a district where it is surely greatly needed. The gross results of such work are always hard to come by, but even from the net results as expressed in figures, Faith Mission has more than justified its existence and proved its worth. The disorganized group of twenty-three children has developed into a modern Sunday school of one hundred and sixty, having sixteen teachers, eight officers and a library of almost a thousand volumes. There is now a mission membership of two hundred and fifty, and from this outpost in the enemies' midst forty-nine persons have united with the Dutch Reformed Church at Vermilye Chapel; two, the Methodist Episcopal Church; two, the Baptist Church; two, the Salvation Army; and seven, other churches of various denominations outside the city.

Early in the history of the work the children of the neighborhood became a problem for the mission workers. A place was needed where they could be gathered from the streets to play under wholesome influences and be shielded from the evil that is always abroad in the district where they live. Lacking any better facilities, a large flagged yard in the rear of the mission was appropriated for this purpose. Planted with sturdy flowers and climbing vines, it soon became a spot much to be preferred to the dirty street, and now almost every day of the summer months, when the children are most out of doors, finds from seventy-five to a hundred of them playing contentedly in the yard. From these boys and girls special organizations in connection with the mission work have been formed. Over thirty boys have been enrolled as a troop of the Boys' Brigade of America, and a girls' club of forty members devotes its attention to sewing classes and other work that is planned for their instruction and advancement.

Recently from this group of boys and girls a choir has been formed under the leadership of Miss Grace Hildebrandt, and to judge from its present development it bids fair to be one of the best choirs of children's voices in the city.

A unique phase of the Faith Mission summer work has grown directly from its backyard playground. The experience here was that of all similar enterprises in that it proved almost impossible to get the people to come to even the shortest service in the hot, gas-lighted mission rooms. This suggested the use of the stone-paved yard. An open-air platform was put in, and settees to accommodate about one hundred and fifty people were secured. Here the summer services are held, and as the yard is in a block of densely peopled tenement houses the audience is usually largely added to by listeners in the banks of windows that rise on every side. In these services Miss Hildebrandt again comes valiantly to the assistance of the superintendent. Her voice, with its wonderful carrying power, fairly fills the block, and many a ribald song and vicious oath is hushed as the song of the "Gospel Nightingale" fills the evening air with the message of Christ.

Give Your Painter Pure Linseed Oil

As well as Pure White Lead

THAT old saying, "You can't judge paint in the pail," is perfectly true when there is no sure way of knowing what the paint was made of.

It isn't true, though, when you talk about "Dutch Boy Painter" made-to-order paint, because you know precisely what that contains. That's the kind the painter prepares from Both are pure. The linseed oil is supplied to the house owner in our one- and five-gallon cans, sealed at the spout, and guaranteed by the "Dutch Boy Painter" trade-mark to be just as it was pressed from the flaxseed. The painter mixes the lead and oil in proportions to suit the conditions of each job as he finds it. Besides knowing what it is, he knows what it will do.

Paint of that kind put on early this Fall will dry hard before the rough weather comes and protect your property from its ravages. Another thing that kind of paint will do is beautify the interior of your home and make it more attractive for the shut-in life during the cold weather.

A UNIQUE EVANGELISM

FARMER boy, then storekeeper, traveling salesman, local Y. M. C. A. secretary, traveling secretary and organizer for the Young Men's Christian Association, evangelist to the men of the industrial world: such, in brief, is the life history of A. M. Bruner, executive secretary of the Industrial Evangelistic Foundation, and one of the Community Extension experts of the Men and Religion Forward Movement of 1911 and 1912.

A. M. Bruner

Coming from an Illinois farm, he entered business, meeting with success, but later gave his life to definite Christian work, entering the service of the Young Men's Christian Association. In 1885 he became assistant secretary at Minneapolis, and two years later was called to become one of the Department State Secretaries of Illinois, and was placed in charge of the railroad and city department of Association work, a position which he held for twenty-three years. In the work of organization and supervision, he was used in accomplishing large results, pushing the department to a place of power, with more than thirty flourishing associations, employing a hundred men, and owning an equipment totaling two millions of dollars.

In 1909 Mr. Bruner was one of the delegates from America to the World's Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations in Barmen-Elberfeld, Germany. On his return, he entered a new field of labor, which was the natural outgrowth of his years of experience among men. He began evangelistic work, under the auspices of the Association, and since then has been doing a most effective work in shops and factories as an industrial evangelist.

Mr. Bruner was one of the most enthusiastic promoters of the "Sixth Message of the Forward Movement," known as "Community Extension," which he defines as "the entering wedge of the Gospel to the unreached, unchurched masses, an inter-church enterprise, not an end in itself, including with industrial communities rural districts, where the country church is gradually disappearing from the map."

With the close of the Forward Movement, Mr. Bruner reorganized the Industrial Evangelistic Foundation, enlarging the committee from seven members in Illinois to a National Extension Committee, with twenty-seven members representing twenty-five cities and twenty-three States.

"Bruner's shop talks" have been heard by railroad, shop and factory men throughout the entire country. His work is of the plain, fearless, direct sort which appeals to men because they can understand it. The results from his efforts have been clear and definite, and he has won a place for himself as a special evangelist to the more than twenty million men in the class that has been appointed for his field.

THE RINGS OF THE ANCIENTS

SINCE jeweled rings are such a widespread fashion to-day, it is interesting to know that wonderful rings set with emeralds, rubies, sapphires, diamonds, turquoises and all our favorite stones, were just as popular among men and women two thousand years ago.

In the days of Cæsar, a Roman of wealth or prominence covered all his fingers with rings. Not only the first joints of the fingers were covered with jewels, but the second joints also, and for this use rings were made with small bands. A rich Roman often wore as many as sixty rings at once, and usually kept them on even when asleep in his bed.

Frequently the bands and settings of these Roman rings were made hollow, so that the weight would be lessened, for the task of carrying around sixty solid gold rings set with jewels would be more than even a vain Roman was willing to undertake.

As far back as those days of ancient glory, the onyx was believed to bestow upon its wearer the gift of oratory and overmastering persuasion, for Juvenal mentions one lawyer hiring a grand ring to wear in court, and because of it he obtained greater success and higher fees than any of the others. Juvenal also says that huge rings set with sardonyx were badges of military rank.

A woman's ring, taken from the ruins of Pompeii, is made precisely in the fashion of the present day—it is a hoop design set with emeralds, and the workmanship is exquisite.

The turquoise is the gem of Persia. A magnificent turquoise ring has been found which is known to be over a thousand years old. It is carved with the portraits of the then reigning monarch and his queen, and this carving is wonderfully inlaid with gold.

A Good-Looking Dependable Business Wagon

THERE'S a look of sturdy reliability and independence about an International auto wagon that makes friends for it wherever it goes. The car is just as reliable and dependable as its looks indicate. In endurance contests it equals cars costing three times as much. In economy it stands at the head of its class. In dependability and all round utility, it beats them all.

Every day you run an International auto wagon you will find it more useful to you. With it you can make the trips you used to neglect, because you did not want to take the horses from their work. Perishable products are handled speedily, or taken to the most profitable market. Best of all the car saves money as well as makes it.

International Auto Wagons

help make farm life pleasant. It is a pleasure to run the car and it is so reliable, so ready to go at any time or for any purpose that it soon becomes indispensable. It can be used in all seasons when the road is passable to horses. The wheels are high enough to give ample road clearance. Solid tires give good traction and eliminate many tire troubles. The engine is simple and powerful. Fuel and oil to run an International auto wagon cost less than the feed for a horse, while the wagon will do from two to four times as much work.

It will pay you in many ways to know all about the International auto wagon. A letter brings full particulars with many interesting facts and figures.

VIEWS ON THE CATHOLIC QUESTION

The Question in Illinois

I FEEL like extending my appreciation for the excellent articles which have been appearing in your valued paper on the Roman menace in this our land of liberty. I admire your courage and loyalty to the thousands who read your columns from week to week. There is enough integrity and patriotism in this country to stop any further advances of this fallen band of political plunderers in a false religious garb, if all will rally to the call that is coming from so many quarters. I trust your pen, and the pen of every brave American editor, will continue to be more powerful than the sword, and that a flood of balots will soon replace the many politicians who are falling over themselves in the effort to kiss the Pope's big toe. Keep it up, my brother, and God and America are with you. In the meantime let us labor and pray that a flood of light shall shine unto the many who are being deceived by the Roman hierarchy—false prophets from Pope down—and that they shall be brought to know the Lord's Christ, and having come in saving touch with him, the priest will have lost his hold.

I wish you godspeed in your work of faith and labor of love in leading men to the Cross. JOHN H. WHITEMAN, Office Editor, Free Methodist.
Chicago, Ill.

A Kindly Suggestion

ON PAGE 793 of your issue dated August 14, in commenting on "The Pope and the Ne Temere Decree," you state that "the humiliated family (Stephen Dagonya and Mary Csoma) is probably poor and helpless, and without the means of taking the case to court for vindication," etc.

I sincerely hope that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will at once open its columns for subscription so that an indignant Protestant public can at once instruct a capable lawyer to secure for the parents a legal judgment that will save them from going through life with the finger of scorn pointed at them." Can the dear old CHRISTIAN HERALD do less than this in such a worthy cause? W. J. C.
Newton Highlands, Mass.

A Service to Humanity

I HAVE been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for about twenty years, and have not in that time ever differed very much from the general policy of the paper. In the main, it has as always led in great humanitarian movements, such as must have met the commendation of angels as well as men. At no time in its history has it undertaken a greater work for God and humanity than at the present. The unmasking of the Roman Catholic Church is one of the greatest needs of this country. Your course is both dignified and courageous, and I assure you that you will do a service for humanity and the Lord Jesus, which only a truly great leader could do.

For the sake of the crying millions who get the priestly stone of tradition and the serpent of absolution when they ask for the Bread of Life; for the sake of the national life whose very existence is threatened by the priestly peril, keep up the fight until the "land of the free" is forever free from foreign ecclesiastical domination.
Washington, D. C. ZED H. COPP.

Papal Supremacy Over State

THE priesthood is now an army, and all those in its ranks are subject to orders. There are no free lances. Time was when priests and even monks could roam over the world at their own sweet will, immune from temporal laws and privileged to do and go where they pleased. Now every man in orders, and every man and woman under vows, is subject to some ecclesiastical authority, and that authority will have to answer to Rome for the conduct of all those subject to them. All the retired priests of France have been "called to the colors," and the drones of the sanctuary have been given the option of exercising the ministry for the good of the people, or of secularizing themselves as far as the active ministry goes. They must be priests in the fullest sense of the word, or they may not say mass.

As regards those eighteen Canadian priests, they must return to the obedience of their bishop or become practically laymen. It will not do to say that teaching is a profession, and priests can devote themselves to it, as they might to painting, or music, or literature, or science. That notion is now exploded. Priests can devote themselves to secular pursuits or liberal professions with the consent of their bishop, but not otherwise. But as regards education: that is a field covered by the church, and in it she is supreme. The state has usurped her duties, but she has not abdicated them and she will not permit her priests to wrest them from her.—Western Watchman (Catholic), August 22.

A Defender Needed

AS ONE of the subscribers to your valuable paper, permit me to say that I am very much pleased with your attitude toward the Roman Catholic Church, or, rather, hierarchy. I also read with great interest the article in your issue of August 14, entitled "The Pope and the Ne Temere Decree." You say very properly: "That any church should have the audacity to defame those who have complied with the laws of the land seems almost incredible, yet here is the positive evidence that Rome claims this right and exercises it in this republic." You mention several individual cases where this has been done; people, however, whose circumstances forbid them to seek redress and demand reparation in the courts. Is there no man with means and moral courage sufficient to take up one of these cases in the courts and publicly brand this outrage done to citizens of this "land of the free and home of the brave" by a foreign ruler?
H. GRINTZENBERG,
Retired Minister of the M. E. Church.
Cincinnati, Ohio.

The Pope and the Pilgrims

THE Pope, on July 25, received seventy pilgrims from Denver, Col. They were presented to the Pontiff by Bishop Kennedy, the rector of the American College. The Pope blessed the pilgrims and thanked them for their liberal contributions of Peter's pence.

Catholics for Office

IT IS gratifying to note that through the efforts of our Catholic societies Catholic chaplains are being appointed in public and penal institutions throughout the country. In Missouri the Catholic societies have made it possible to have a permanent chaplain at the State penitentiary since last October. A special society called The Prisoners' Aid Society has been formed which is collecting funds for this worthy undertaking. The Juvenile Courts are being looked after by County Federations in many localities, notably in Cincinnati and Columbus.—Boston Pilot, August 24.

A., Superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point, has been assigned to the command of the Eastern Division of the Army, in succession to the late General Grant. Rear Admiral Ward, U.S.N., the new Catholic head of the New York Navy Yard, has been appointed naval aide to Mr. Knox, Secretary of State, who will represent this country at the funeral of the late Mikado of Japan. General Frank McIntyre, U.S.A., a Catholic, has just been appointed Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs at Washington.—Catholic Citizen, August 24.

Questions and Answers

G. H. B., Yankton, S. D. How many stars can be seen with the naked eye, and how many with a telescope?

About 7,000 stars are visible to the naked eye, and it is computed that from 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 can be discerned through the most powerful telescopes.

J. J. M., Springfield, Mass. 1. What are the three largest railroad stations in the world? 2. What are the three greatest streets in the world?

1. Grand Central, New York City, covering 28 acres; the Gare St. Lazare, Paris, covering 25 acres; the Waverly Station, Edinburgh, covering 23 acres. 2. Fleet Street and the Strand, London; Broadway, New York; Unter den Linden, Berlin.

C. C. P., Des Moines, Ia. I have a sword-cane of General Jackson ("Old Hickory") in my possession, the sword over two feet long and the cane of unique workmanship; also an old-style letter Bible of 1630. Where could I dispose of these relics?

If you care to advertise, probably there are many private collectors who would be glad to make you an offer. You might write to some of the museums, say the curator of the Field Columbian Museum, Chicago, or the Carnegie Institute, Pittsburg, Pa.

E. G. B., Philadelphia, Pa. Our superintendent asked "which was made first, man or the Sabbath?" Will the Mail-Bag answer?

Man was created on the sixth day. (See Gen. 1: 26-31.) On the seventh, God, having ended the work of creation, rested. (See Gen. 2: 2, 3.) This is the order given in the Scripture and it is divided as follows: first day, light (general); second day, earth and water divided; third day, land and water outlined, and vegetation created; fourth day, light (direct); fifth day, lower animals created; sixth day, mammals and man created; seventh day, rest.

B. C., Oneida, Kan. In your paper of July 17 you printed an item in regard to a tornado which visited Regina, the capital of Saskatchewan. Where are these places?

Saskatchewan is in Canada and comprises the eastern half of the former district of Athabasca and the greater part of the old districts of Assiniboia and Saskatchewan, and was proclaimed a province in 1905. It is bounded on the east by Manitoba and Keewatin, on the west by Alberta, on the north by the Mackenzie District and on the south by the United States. Regina is the capital. Other towns are Indian Head, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon and Yorktown. Saskatchewan is a great agricultural province, especially noted for the large production of wheat and barley.

Reader, Three Forks, Mont. 1. The Jewish Sabbath was Saturday. In the Gospel dispensation, the first day of the week (Sunday) is recognized as the Christian Sabbath in commemoration of the resurrection. This was done also for the purpose of marking the distinction between Christian and Jewish worship. In the New Testament the Sabbath is called "the Lord's Day." At the time when it began to be observed there was no Catholic Church in existence. 2. The eating of unclean meats is forbidden, but not of other meats. 3. The old dispensation is that which relates to Israel in the Mosaic law; the new is that which came in with the advent of the Saviour and the beginning of the Gospel dispensation of grace.

J. A. B., Upland, Calif., referring to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's comments on the case of Commissioner Valentine, writes: "This whole fuss you are making about these Indian mission schools is a little bit of political play to embarass the President in his fight for re-election. Congress having refused to repeal the law appropriating money to aid these schools, it is the duty of the President to see that the Catholics have control of them and that the teachers shall wear the usual clothing or insignia customary for teachers engaged in that school. I think that when a superior officer of the Interior Department made an order seeking to regulate the garb to be worn by these teachers, he, Mr. Valentine, was guilty of an offense against Congress and the President and the Secretary of the Interior, who have full control of these schools. Mr. Valentine knew that his order would breed trouble for the President, and that is the reason, no doubt, it was made, at the instance of your paper and others of like views. Don't think that this course of yours and the Methodist Church, of which I am a member, will deceive any one. . . . The Catholic Church may want to elect Taft, while THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wants to elect Roosevelt."

Our correspondent is no doubt entitled to his own opinion, although it happens that he is wrong on all the facts of the case. 1. Commissioner Valentine obeyed an authority higher than even the President or Congress or Secretary Fischer, viz., the Constitution of the United States and the rulings of the United

JUST at the time when you are wondering what entertainments you can plan for this Fall that are sure to be successful---we have a rattling good suggestion to offer:

¶ Hold a Mock Trial on "The Case of Jennie Brice." Mock Trials are the most interesting fun imaginable---easiest of all entertainments to arrange---when you have a good plot or story to start with. And you get the most puzzling plot, intensely interesting story, all the material for your trial, in a thoroughly mystifying novel, "The Case of Jennie Brice," by Mary Roberts Rinehart, to be published in EVERYBODY'S MAGAZINE this Fall. Mrs. Rinehart is famous for "The Man in Lower Ten," "When a Man Marries," (Seven Days), "The Strange Adventures of Letitia Carberry," and other popular stories.

Will Find This An Easy Way To Raise $25 to $750

¶ To make "The Case of Jennie Brice" doubly entertaining to yourself and your friends, the publishers of EVERYBODY'S MAGAZINE will award to those who best solve its mysterious happenings. The complete story will be published in four big installments in EVERYBODY'S MAGAZINE, commencing with the October number (on sale September 23d). Your trial can be held after the third instalment has appeared (November 23d) and before December 20th, when the contest closes. There are no restrictions of any kind. In order to compete you do not have to be a subscriber to EVERYBODY'S. There is no age limit. Any one---old or young---man or woman---can act in any capacity at your trial.

$11,540 in Cash Rewards

413 PRIZES

¶ There will be three National Prizes, one for $500, one for $300, one for $200. Also 381 state prizes and 29 Canadian prizes, making 413 in all. National prize-winners will be selected from all competitors irrespective of state boundaries. The 381 state prizes will be awarded only to those in competition within the limits of each state, and are as follows:

G. P. R., Galesburg, Ill. 1. Why are some months longer than others? 2. What should be the exact length of a month?

1. In the early reckoning the length of a month was measured by a revolution of the moon around the earth. The present system of long and short months was instituted as being adaptable to the arrangement of the yearly calendar, hence they are called calendar months, and range from 28 to 31 days. 2. There are several kinds of months. A sidereal month is reckoned according to a revolution of the moon from a position among the stars to the same position and consists of 27.32166 days; if the period is reckoned from new moon to new moon it is a synodic month and contains 29.53059 days. The time of the moon's revolution from perigee to perigee, that is, from the point in the orbit nearest the earth to the same point, is an anamolistic month, requiring 27.55460 days. The nodical month having 27.21222 days is the interval between the moon's passage of and return to the same node.

J. D., Clarkston, Wash. Please inform me how the "kingdom of God" can be established in the hearts of men now, when Jesus will say at the judgment "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you at the foundation of the world"?

The kingdom of the Messiah, which was foretold by many of the prophets and is further explained in the New Testament, is a divine, spiritual kingdom, to be built up in the hearts of men and ultimately to become universal. It is described in the early prophecies as a coming golden age, when the true religion should be re-established and universal peace and happiness should prevail. Unquestionably, it was regarded by the Jews in a temporal sense only, but the Saviour himself declared it to be a spiritual kingdom, and his followers look forward to its highest realization only after his return. Meanwhile, from the beginning of the Christian dispensation, the kingdom has progressed in the hearts of men. That Jesus himself intended to convey this is made clear in Matt. 8: 12; 11: 12; 11: 28; Mark 12: 34; Luke 11: 9, 11, and many other passages which deal with the various phases of the same subject. The passage in Matt. 24, to which you refer, describes the condition of the believers at the judgment and their welcome to the fulness of the kingdom, with all its blessings and rewards.

Miscellaneous

W. L. T., Oakshall, Va. No such passage in the Bible.

H. B., Springtown, O. We have no data on the subject, but believe the statement to be fairly correct.

Sincere Inquirer, Andover, Mass. The Old Testament contains throughout a line of prophecies of the coming of the Messiah, and the New Testament tells the story of his coming, mission, Gospel, life-work, death, atonement and resurrection, and the duty of his followers for the upbuilding of his kingdom. One who does not accept Christ as divine rejects the very basis of the revealed Word. To him, its prophecies of a Saviour and their fulfilment are alike meaningless.

Constant Reader, Asbury Park, N. J. The option to renew, given by the owner of the property, would not be binding, unless you gave some consideration to the owner to induce him to sign it. Not being binding on the owner, the agreement to renew the lease would not be binding on any subsequent purchaser of the property. If you did give any consideration for the owner's agreement to renew the lease, however small, the renewal agreement would be binding on a subsequent purchaser.

Reader, Dell Rapids. Both are needed, more trained and equipped workers for the foreign field and more money for their support. The same applies in a less degree in the home field. A college education is not considered indispensable for missionary work, although it is always an advantage. There are training schools for missionaries, where they can receive a regular course of preparation. It is seldom nowadays that any denomination sends a missionary to service who has not had the necessary special training to fit him for the work.

G. H. R., Shiremanstown, Pa. 1. Some churches are autocratic, while others allow considerable latitude to their congregations in many different ways. Disobedience to the order or rule of a church conference respecting the wearing of a certain garb would not be visited by excommunication or expulsion by any Protestant body. Neither would any action be taken against a member who might marry outside the church. 2. The passage in Isa. 45: 7 (second clause) does not refer to moral evil, but to war, disaster, disturbances of the natural order of things, in contrast to peace. It is very important to get the right meaning of this passage, which is frequently misinterpreted.

The Postal Life Insurance Company Safeguards at Lowest Cost the Wife, the Children, the Home

Postal-Life Child's-Welfare Policy

The welfare of the child — some child — is ever on the minds of most men and women — the thoughtful, unselfish ones.

This means not alone food and clothing, but education, for in these progressive days the young man or woman without a good education is handicapped, to say the least.

But education isn't always so easy. Grammar school and high school, yes; for the youngsters live at home and the cost doesn't seem to count.

It is another matter when high-school days are over and the next step — the necessary step — must be seminary or college.

Net Cost Lowest in the POSTAL because
1st. Commission Dividends, ranging up to 50% of the annual premium on whole-life policies, go to Policyholders the first year.
2d. Renewal-Commission Dividends and Office-expense Savings, covered by the 9½%
guaranteed dividends, go to Policyholders in subsequent years.
3d. The usual contingent Policy dividends, enhanced by Postal Life economies, still further reduce the cost each year after the first.

Just at this critical point, the lack of a few hundred dollars in cash has prematurely sent many a boy and girl into the store, office or factory to struggle along for years at scanty wages because they lacked the educational equipment to get ahead quickly.

What a life-sacrifice — this lack of means to even start the young folks right!

The Right Way to Start the Young Folks

Some parents may think that by the time the child grows up the money will come somehow, but it will hardly "come" unless provided for in advance by systematic saving — the easy way.

What a fine situation if when the young man or woman reaches twenty there is available, let us say, an endowment of $1,000, payable in four yearly payments, being the proceeds of a matured Child's-Welfare Policy!

The way is opened to fulfill every parental obligation to assist the child into a professional or business career; and the Policy also includes certain specified insurance protection, as well.

Let us tell you about this special Child's-Welfare Policy —its options, advantages, benefits and moderate cost.

At the same time, let us give you particulars about insurance for yourself: the POSTAL LIFE issues all the standard forms of protection for men, women and young people.

Winter-Proof Paint

White Lead, like the metallic lead from which it is made, is tough and ductile. With linseed oil it combines into a leathery and elastic paint film that stretches in summer and contracts in winter without breaking. The adulteration of White Lead destroys this elasticity, weakens the resistance to extremes of temperature and finally results in cracking and scaling paint.

White Lead made by the modern Carter process is guaranteed strictly pure and has every good quality of any pure White Lead. And it is so fine that it has unusual covering capacity and durability, and is so white that it has established a new standard of whiteness for white paint and given new life and beauty to colors.

To get the utmost value in paint, have your painter use Carter White Lead and pure linseed oil mixed to your order.

Everything you want to know about house-painting is told in our text book "Pure Paint."

HAPPY COZY CORNER DAYS

My attention has been called to the fact that there might be unfair discrimination in awarding three prizes only to the first three friends who correctly guess the name of the little girl whose picture appears above.

Some boys and girls live far away, and it would take the mails many days to bring in their replies. Others live within a few blocks of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, which would give them an unfair advantage over distant ones.

I am therefore compelled to call off the contest. But I do not want any of you to be disappointed, so I am going to offer you the following:

To any boy or girl who will send me the names of three friends who might become interested in the Cozy Corner I will send a lovely prize. You have only to send their names and addresses. Please enclose a stamped envelope, not smaller than 7x4 inches, addressed to yourself.

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner

CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City.

YOU CAN DO THIS, TOO

A BOY I know grows a superior variety of new potatoes of most unusual texture and delicacy of flavor. He has been doing it for three years, and is already planning to pay his way through a first-class agricultural college with what he calls "my potato proceeds."

Two years ago he found a heap of potatoes in a perfectly dark room in the stable. Instead of being decayed each potato was surrounded by bunches of almost perfectly white little potatoes about the size of hickory nuts. They looked so good, he cooked some of them in a dipper on a tin stove in the barnyard, and because they tasted much more delicate than the usual "new potato" he decided all on his own hook to experiment systematically with them and waste no time on a paltry dozen or two. Selecting large, perfect potatoes without the slightest blemish he spread uniformly dry vegetable mold sifted fine and three or four inches deep on the bare floor of the same dark room from which every particle of light was excluded. He half buried the potatoes in rows about four inches apart, never allowing a ray of daylight to touch them, and within three weeks of the first planting many pure white "new potatoes" about the size of a walnut had developed on the old potatoes. These he removed and made gifts to his friends. In a few weeks more a second crop was gathered, and after this a third from the original planting. His "dark garden" spread to the cellar and an old loft, and to-day the Joe Hawkins potatoes sell like eggs for so much a dozen in the open village market, and within two years Joe has about fifty private customers to buy all the new potatoes he can raise.

To Take to School

RECESS Cookies: One and one-half cupfuls of molasses, one cup granulated sugar, one cup butter, half teaspoon salt, one heaping teaspoonful each of ginger and cinnamon, one cupful of cold water in which two heaping teaspoonfuls of soda have been dissolved, flour enough to roll soft.

Don't Do It—It Doesn't Pay

MOST boys have heard a whole lot about the evils of cigarette smoking and I want to add just a word more. You can't blame me. I heard Judge Ben B. Lindsey, "the Boy's Friend," say it, and I want you to hear it too. "See here," said the judge to a gang of boys arraigned before him for general bad conduct, "it is cigarette smoking brings you here. I can tell it by looking at you." Then leaning over his desk and looking squarely into the faces of that line of good-for-nothings, "cigarette smoking doesn't pay," he added. "It dulls the moral nature. Its effect on the physical and nervous systems is little short of deadly. It over-stimulates and then stupefies the nerves. It sends boys into consumption and insane asylums. "I have seen bright boys," the judge continued, "turned into dunces and cowards by it. Boys who smoke cigarettes are like wormy apples. They droop before the harvest."

TABLE RULES FOR LITTLE FOLK

IN SILENCE I must take my seat,
And give God thanks before I eat;
Must for my food in patience wait,
Till I am asked to hand my plate.

I must not scold, nor whine, nor pout,
Nor move my chair or plate about;
With knife or fork or anything,
I must not play; nor must I sing.

I must not speak a useless word,
For children should be seen, not heard;
I must not talk about my food,
Nor fret if I don't think it good.

I must not say, "The bread is old,"
I must not say, "The soup is cold,"
I must not cry for this or that,
Nor murmur if my meat is fat.

My mouth with food I must not crowd,
Nor while I'm eating speak aloud;
Must turn my head to cough or sneeze,
And when I ask, say, "If you please."

The tablecloth I must not spoil,
Nor with my food my fingers soil;
Must keep my seat when I have done,
Nor round the table sport or run.

When told to rise, then I must put
My chair away with noiseless foot;
And lift my heart to God above,
In praise for all his wondrous love.

J. TROWBRIDGE.

A FOOD CONVERT

Good Food the True Road to Health.

The pernicious habit some persons still have of relying on nauseous drugs to relieve stomach trouble, keeps up the patent medicine business and helps keep up the army of dyspeptics.

Indigestion—dyspepsia—is caused by what is put into the stomach in the way of improper food, the kind that so taxes the strength of the digestive organs they are actually crippled.

When this state is reached, to resort to tonics is liking whipping a tired horse with a big load. Every additional effort he makes under the lash diminishes his power to move the load.

Try helping the stomach by leaving off heavy, greasy, indigestible food and take on Grape-Nuts — light, easily digested, full of strength for nerves and brain, in every grain of it. There's no waste of time nor energy when Grape-Nuts is the food.

"I am an enthusiastic user of Grape-Nuts and consider it an ideal food," writes a Maine man:

"I had nervous dyspepsia and was all run down and my food seemed to do me but little good. From reading an advertisement I tried Grape-Nuts food, and after a few weeks' steady use of it, felt greatly improved.

"Am much stronger, not nervous now, and can do more work without feeling so tired, and am better every way.

"I relish Grape-Nuts best with cream and use four heaping teaspoonfuls as the cereal part of a meal. I am sure there are thousands of persons with stomach trouble who would be benefited by using Grape-Nuts. Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. REV. EZRA T. SANFORD DEAD

The Late Rev. Ezra T. Sanford

ONE of the most active Baptist ministers in New York City, Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, of the North Baptist Church, West Eleventh Street, died suddenly at his home in Chester, N. Y., on August 23. For several months he had been a sufferer from heart disease. He was sixty-seven years old and had been in charge of the North Baptist Church for seven years. He was one of the leading clergymen of the Baptist denomination.

Dr. Sanford was a graduate of Cornell University, following a course at College, and completed his education for the ministry in the Union Theological Seminary. In 1892 he accepted the call to the Baptist Church in Cornwall, N. Y. He was afterward pastor of the Baptist Churches at Port Jervis, N. Y., and Hackensack, N. J. He came to New York City in 1905.

Dr. Sanford was a man of many Christian activities and was particularly fond of Sunday-school work. For ten years past he visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Children's Home at Mont-Lawn every summer and was a special favorite with the children, who loved to listen to his illustrated stories of travel in foreign lands. He was a most genial and lovable man, a ready speaker, and an earnest and successful soul-winner. The interment took place in the family burying-ground at Warwick, N. Y.

BARBARA FRIETCHIE

In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a writer asserts the authenticity of the alleged events narrated in Whittier's poem, namely, that during the march of the Confederate soldiers through Frederick, Md., Barbara Frietchie, an old, gray-headed woman, appeared at a window and waved a Union flag in the face of Stonewall Jackson, the Southern commander. The latter is reported to have given strict orders that no one should fire upon the old woman.

This is a very pretty story, but like that of Sergeant Anthony on the sinking of the Maine, it is purely the product of a vivid imagination. Nobody denies the existence of Barbara Frietchie, or that she lived in Frederick at the time, but the alleged exhibition of her patriotism and the Southern general's order have been contradicted time and again by those who accompanied General Jackson on that occasion. Years ago I read these denials, all of which stated that Barbara Frietchie was bedridden at the time, to make the matter doubly sure I have been making investigation since John Iglehart's article appeared, with the following result:

Rev. Dr. James Power Smith, of Richmond, Va., who was appointed on General Jackson's staff the day after the entry into Frederick, and was with that time closely associated with the general and his staff and many General officers of his command, writes that he never heard the story until after the war was over. He says that Colonel H. Kyd Douglas, of Hagerstown, Md., was with Jackson when he entered Frederick, and guided him through the town, and that Colonel Douglas repeatedly published the statement that neither the general nor the troops passed the home of old Barbara and that there was no firing on any flag. The story has been denied again and again by other officers who were with Jackson or in his command. Dr. Smith (now summering in the Blue Ridge) adds: "I believe it was denied in a public letter by a kinswoman of old Barbara. I am away from my papers and cannot quote the authorities. I have never believed a word of the story."

Even if the flag had been displayed by the old woman, it was only what was openly done by other women in that and other communities. Major General E. M. Law, a distinguished Confederate officer residing in this town, tells me that he and his troops passed through Frederick on that occasion. He says that the girls and women were timid at first when the Confederates entered the town, but when they perceived that they would not be insulted or molested, they became very bold and appeared openly in the doorways, at the windows, and on the porches, wearing Union flags as aprons and across the breast, and waving small flags at the soldiers. One of them even accosted a soldier and asked him if he would not like to fight under that flag. The soldiers greeted the women pleasantly. General Law assures me that the same thing was done by the women of Chambersburg, Pa., and other towns of that section, which shows that the Southern soldiers had no thought of shooting a woman because she exhibited a Union flag, and hence General Jackson's order (as alleged in the poem) was altogether unnecessary.

SUGGESTIONS TO FALL HOUSE CLEANERS

In "fixing up" your house for the winter, you may find that you need coverings for one or more floors. You may also be undecided as to just what to buy. Permit us to suggest.

Some people seem to have the idea that CREX floor coverings are used principally on living porches and in summer homes. This is a wrong impression—a CREX covering will grace any floor of the house.

There is no covering, of modest cost, so cleanly, so bright, so cheerful, so durable and so healthful. The cost, compared with even cotton coverings, favors CREX.

There are runners for halls and stairs, carpets for unpolished floors and rugs where desired. The color scheme of any room may be matched.

Bed chambers with CREX rugs or carpet are a delight. The delicate fragrance of the natural untreated grass soothes the nerves and promotes peaceful rest. You do not have to tack down CREX coverings—they lie flat—never curl.

CREX
Grass Carpets and Rugs
TRADE MARK

CREX products are made of scientifically cultured wire-grass—the most cleanly, economical and sanitary material known for floor coverings—by patented spinning and weaving machinery.

There are imitation grass coverings selling at a trifle less price, but you will find CREX more beautiful, more substantial and more durable. Insist upon the genuine.

Most carpet, furniture and house-furnishing dealers carry the CREX line. Go to your dealer and make a careful inspection. Note the modest patterns and colorings—of which you will never tire.

Examine the weave, which you will find is porous—yet substantial—therefore permits the dust to sift through instead of holding, as do woolen and cotton coverings. The task of keeping your rooms in clean, sanitary condition is cut to the minimum.

If you will send us your name and address, asking for Catalogue H, we will mail you, with our compliments, our latest edition, showing sizes and patterns in lifelike colors.

FINDING LIFE IN THE PRESENCE OF DEATH

IT WAS a fitting close of the funeral services of the great general of the Salvation Army at the Olympia in London, when the strains of mournful music were hushed and the signs of mourning forgotten and the great assembly gave itself up to the old-time revival fervor. While the body of the dead general lay before the platform, his son Bramwell, the Army's new general, led in the singing of invitation hymns, while the unconverted and backsliders crowded forward to kneel at the "penitent forms." Benches had been placed at the right and left of the general's casket, and above them were great signs bearing the words, "Mercy Seat." Here the penitents knelt, while the singing rolled on, and other seekers joined them. Death had indeed lost its sting. The joys of salvation dried the tears of those who mourned their departed chief, for they knew he was not dead. After a mighty chorus:

"His blood can make the foulest clean,
His blood avails for me," which the general had sung at nearly every meeting he conducted in recent years, the vast congregation joined in singing,

"When the roll is called up yonder, I'll be there."

Thus, even in death, General Booth drew others to the Cross. Sorrow at his death deepened the conviction of sin and led sinners to the joys of salvation. Death was swallowed up in victory. For many years it will continue to be said of William Booth: "He being dead yet speaketh."

was another strain of blood introduced. This was the people converted to Christianity who made these regions of North Africa the stronghold of the early Christian Church. Here lived Tertullian, Cyprian and Augustine, the leaders of the Christian world.

The Blind Woman of Algiers is a type of the Kabyles of to-day, living in a stone-walled dungeon for twelve hundred years, with the mark of the ancient faith on their faces, but all its power lost from head, heart and home. This people is in a desperate condition, for the old life is being revolutionized by the new civilization, which gives them no help, but makes their situation still more desperate.

Their only possible hope for help lies with the womanhood of Christian America. The Methodist Episcopal Church is the only organized Protestant church in all these regions. The Roman Catholic Church is here, but it never has in the past, does not now, and never can, so long as it remains what it is, give the help needed. The responsibility lies on the Methodist Episcopal Church alone. A splendid beginning has been made. The Blind Woman of Algiers has been found and put in a cleaner room. The task now is to enter as a friend the filth-filled habitation of Islam and lead out its blind and beggared childhood, womanhood and manhood to the health-giving sunlight and sweetness of a Gospelized life; to give civilized Christian homes to those who have so long lived in "the hole in the wall."

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS A SUBSCRIBER

Don't Doctor Corns With Steel

Don't pare them. That just removes the top layer. It leaves the main part to grow.

A slip of the blade may mean infection. Sometimes a dangerous infection.

This form of home surgery should be ended forever.

A few years ago a chemist invented the B & B wax — the heart of the Blue-jay plaster.

Now you simply apply this plaster. It is done in a jiffy. The pain instantly stops, and the corn is forgotten.

This wonderful wax gently loosens the corn. In two days the whole corn, root and branch, comes out. No soreness, no discomfort.

Please don't doubt it.

Fifty million corns have been removed in this way. Millions of people know it. Just try it yourself, and never again will you let corns cause you pain.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Life is too short for any Shotgun Shortcomings!

Why should your pleasure or your game bag suffer because of some oversight or omission of the gun maker—no matter how slight?

The six Hunter Brothers' 22 years of Inventions, Precision Workmanship, Purpose and Experience have freed the Smith gun of all the shortcomings, one by one, which other guns—each to a greater or lesser degree—have.

Inaccessibility, for example, is eliminated by the Smith "One-Screw Access" to all working parts. Shooting loose is eliminated by the Smith Rotary Bolt. This takes up wear in all directions by the double wedging of its double claws, which enter the frame after passing through the extension rib.

And so on through the list of gun problems solved the Smith becomes truly the gun with No Shortcomings! If you really want to be up-to-date on gun improvements, send for our handsome catalog, showing grades from $25 net to $1500 list.

ROOSEVELT AT MASS

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Times gives an interesting account of the jubilee held in celebration of the silver anniversary of the ordination of Father John J. Curran, a prominent Catholic priest in Wilkesbarre, Pa., on August 22. Colonel Roosevelt was an honored guest and politics was not barred by any means. The Times' account of the event says:

"Father Curran read the mass, which was celebrated at the Church of the Holy Saviour, East End, and impressive services marked the ceremony. Colonel Roosevelt occupied a front pew, while Bishop M. J. Hoban of Scranton, Vicar General Turner of Philadelphia, and Monsignor O'Mayley of Pittston had seats of honor in the sanctuary. There were perhaps fifty priests present. The church was filled to overflowing.

"It was after the sermon by the Rev. John J. O'Donnell that Father Curran arose to thank those who were doing him honor. Then turning from that subject, he said: 'When times of great upheavals come, I, as priest and citizen, should read and study the conditions as they occur, and should go straight ahead and fight for what I think is right. There are certain factors to-day which are changing our lives, and we must study these conditions. We want justice and the rights of man. We must face these conditions, and once we have the conviction that we are right we must not falter. We must progress. Some may think we are ahead of the times. I do not think so. If we are unselfish in our motives for the uplift of our fellow men we shall win out. I have made up my mind and shall go ahead.'

"As Father Curran and Colonel Roosevelt left the church for the parish house, there was a stampede by the congregation to congratulate the priest and shake hands with the colonel. Roosevelt was escorted to the front porch, from which he spoke briefly.

"The ex-President was hurried by automobile to Harvey's Lake, where he held a short reception, standing beside Father Curran. Then the two hundred guests, including men of all creeds, sat down to dinner, Roosevelt sitting at the head of the table between Father Curran and Monsignor T. F. Coffey of Carbondale. Over the colonel's head were pennants bearing the words, 'Our Next President.'

"After he had smiled his thanks for the applause that greeted him, the colonel praised Father Curran, and then the Catholic priests in general.

"'I want to add one thing to what Bishop Hoban said when he said that in Ireland the priest had a peculiar hold on his parishioners,' began the colonel. 'I want to say that I think the American priest has inherited it in full. There is not another country in the world where it is so well worth while as in America, and where a gathering like this to pay honor to a Catholic priest would be accepted with so little comment. Here all religions gather—Catholics, Protestants and Jews.'"

A REMARKABLE SUNDAY SCHOOL RECORD

The books came with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and in good shape. Please accept thanks for same. I have now gone 900 Sundays to Sunday school and have not missed one Sunday. I live in the country, and for about seven years I went to the United Brethren Church and had to walk two and a half miles each way. About one year I went to the M. E. Church and had five and a half miles each way to go. Most of the remaining time, I went to an M. E. Church two and a quarter miles each way. If the Lord spares my life and gives me health, I will have completed 1,000 links in the golden chain before I stop or miss a Sunday. Some people say that in the winter it is too cold, in the spring too wet and in the summer too hot. Those things have never bothered me. I have read the Bible for nearly seventeen years and have only missed three or four days. I read it book by book, yet have only read it through seven and a half times.

I think THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a paper good beyond description. It is very dear to me.

WE INVITE

Every Thin Man and Woman

This is an invitation that no thin man or woman can afford to ignore. We invite you to try a new treatment called "Sargol" that helps digest the food you eat—that puts good solid flesh on people that are thin and under weight.

How can "Sargol" do this? We will tell you. This new treatment is a scientific, assimilative agent. It increases cell growth, the very substance of which your bodies are made—puts red corpuscles in the blood, which every thin person so sadly needs, strengthens the nerves and puts the digestive tract in such shape that every ounce of food gives out its full amount of nourishment to the blood instead of passing through the system undigested and unassimilated.

Women who never appear stylish in anything they wore because of their thinness, men under weight or lacking in nerve force or energy, have been made to enjoy the pleasures of life—been fitted to fight life's battles, as never for years, through the use of "Sargol."

If you want a beautiful and well rounded figure of which you can justly be proud—a body full of throbbing life and energy, write the Sargol Co., 9-W Herald Building, Binghamton, N.Y., to-day, for 50c box "Sargol," absolutely free, and use with every meal.

But you say that you want proof! Well, here you are. Here is the statement of those who have tried, been convinced, and will swear to the virtues of this preparation:

REV. GEORGE W. DAVIS says:

"I have made a faithful trial of the Sargol treatment and must say it has brought to me new life and vigor. I have gained 20 pounds and now weigh 170 pounds and, what is better, I have gained the days of my boyhood. It has been the turning point of my life."

MRS. A. I. RODENHEISER writes:

"I have gained immensely since I took Sargol, for I only weighed about 106 pounds when I began using it and now I weigh 130 pounds, so that makes 24 pounds. I feel stronger and am looking better than ever before, and now I carry rosy cheeks, which is something I could never say before."

CLAY JOHNSON says:

"Please send me another ten-day treatment. I am well pleased with Sargol. It has been the light of my life. I am getting back to my proper weight again. When I began to take Sargol I only weighed 138 pounds, and now, four weeks later, I am weighing 153 pounds and feeling fine."

F. GAGNON writes:

"Here is my report since taking the Sargol treatment. I am a man 67 years of age, and was all run down to the very bottom. I had to quit work, as I was so weak. Now, thanks to Sargol, I look like a new man. I gained 22 pounds with 28 days' treatment. I cannot tell you how happy I feel."

MRS. VERNIE ROUSE says:

"Sargol is certainly the grandest treatment I ever used. I took only two boxes of Sargol. My weight was 120 pounds and now I weigh 140 and feel better than I have for five years. I am now as fleshy as I want to be, and shall certainly recommend Sargol, for it does just exactly what you say it will do.

Full address of any of these people if you wish.

Probably you are now thinking whether all this can be true. Stop it! Sargol does make thin people add flesh. But we don't ask you to take our word for it. Write us today and we will send you absolutely free a 50c package for trial. Cut off coupon below and pin to your letter.

THIS COUPON GOOD FOR 50c PACKAGE "SARGOL"

Questions and Answers

E. V. M., Newark, N. J. Can you give me a comparison between the wages of bricklayers and stone-masons in this country and England?

In England bricklayers and stone-masons receive about the same, from $9 to $10 weekly, while in the United States the former command $26 to $30 and the latter $23 to $27 weekly. It must be taken into consideration, however, that living is much cheaper in England than in this country, and in face of this, there is not so much dissimilarity as would seem.

E. L. Y., Heppner, Ore. Please explain John 3: 5. Does it have any reference to water baptism?

"Born of water and of the spirit" is a two-fold explanation of the new birth. To the Jewish ecclesiastics, already familiar with the symbolic application of water, this language was designed to show that the real object was a thorough spiritual purification by the operation of the Holy Ghost. This element of water and the operation of the spirit are the subject of prediction in Ezekiel 36: 25-27. The Jews were already familiar with the water symbol, and now, in the Christian Church, they were to have the demonstration of the works of the Holy Ghost in spiritual baptism.

R. G. N., Hawkinsville, Ga. Can a negro be called an Africander?

No; a negro is a black man of African blood, especially a descendant of Senegambian or Sudanese ancestors; an Africander is a person born in South Africa of European, usually meaning Dutch, parents or descent.

A. A. C., Winslow, Ind. 1. When the Apostle Paul spoke of the "great cloud of witnesses" in Heb. 12, I think he had reference to the witnesses he spoke of in the eleventh chapter who had overcome by faith and whom he was holding up as an example to the Christians under this dispensation. 2. Please explain Luke 23: 31.

1. Possibly such an interpretation may be correct, although the other finds the readier acceptance, viz.: that he referred to the ministering spirits from the invisible world. The translation here permits the rendering of the word "compassed" to mean also "above us," the figure of speech being taken from the scene at the national games, where the spectators press around to see the combat. The martyrs in this sense are witnesses of the struggle of faith that is constantly going on in the world. 2. "The green tree and the dry" is an illustration drawn from Jesus' experience as a carpenter. The green tree resists the fire, while the dry attracts it. The spiritual meaning is that if such suffering as he had described came to the innocent, what must be in store for those who are provoking and instigating the suffering?

B. S., Topeka, Kan. 1. Can a Chinaman, under any circumstances, become a citizen of the United States? 2. Can Chinese children, born here, become citizens?

1. No Chinaman can be admitted to citizenship. Section 14, Act of Congress, May 6, 1882, says: "No State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship, and all laws in conflict with this act are repealed." 2. Children born here of Chinese parents who are themselves aliens and incapable of becoming naturalized are citizens of the United States the same as the children of any other nationality.

G. R., Arnprior, Ont. 1. What are the annual amounts of the imports from the United States to Canada and the exports from Canada to the United States?

In 1911 the imports amounted to $269,806,013 and the exports to $100,863,418.

Reader, Canton, O. An evangelist here lately said that the Catholic Church was the first church, meaning the Roman Catholic Church. When and where was the first church established?

The word "church" is first applied by Luke the evangelist to the company of original disciples at Jerusalem at Pentecost (Acts 2: 47), and is afterwards applied in Acts, Epistles and Revelation to the whole Christian body or society, as well as the sanctified of God (Eph. 5: 27), and to those who profess Christian faith under pastors (I. Cor. 12: 28). It was also applied to early societies of Christians in cities and provinces (Acts 8: 1), to Christian assemblies (Rom. 16: 5), and to small gatherings of friends and neighbors in private houses (I. Cor. 11: 18 and 14: 19, 28). In those early days and for a long time afterward, there was no distinctive body and certainly no denomination; the church was simply an appellation describing groups of believers anywhere. Later, these groups were organized into congregations and districts and parishes were defined. Then they were called "Christians," the first use of this appellation being at Antioch. The Romanist claim to priority is an old one, but it does not stand the test of history. The title "Catholic Church" (meaning the "church universal") was originally given to the Christian Church on account of its not being confined to Jews, but embracing other nationalities. The earliest use of this title was about 166 A. D., whereas the Roman Catholic Church, as such, did not come into existence until several centuries afterward, when the original church divided in consequence of the rivalry between the bishops of Rome and Constantinople.

W. B. R., Dayton, O. What are the flower symbols for January and February?

Snowdrop and primrose.

M. H. J., Roanoke, Va. Why is it that all are agreed that Jesus was buried on Friday and rose on Sunday, when he himself said plainly that he would be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth? Matt. 12: 40. May it not be true that he was crucified and buried on Thursday?

Professor Wescott, a great New Testament scholar and one of the editors of the most widely used text of the Greek New Testament, held the view you present, but practically every other authority disagrees with him. The celebration of Friday as the day of our Lord's death and burial dates back to extremely early times in church history. The explanation is that a "day" meant to the Jew a day and a night. Their day began at sunset and continued till the next sunset. The day of the resurrection is fixed without any uncertainty as Sunday. The statement that Christ rose "on the third day" occurs nine times in the New Testament. Figuring back from Sunday, scholars have agreed that he was crucified and buried on Friday. At sunset Friday, the "second day" would begin. At sunset Saturday "the third day" would begin (lasting till sunset the following day), and it was during this day that the Saviour rose. It is true that the expression "three days and three nights" in the passage you mention sounds very emphatic to our Western ears, accustomed to the sharp distinction conveyed by the words in our time and speech. But, as Dr. Whedon comments here, "the Jews reckoned the entire twenty-four hours in an unbroken piece as a night-and-day. They counted the odd fragment of a day, in computation, as an entire night-and-day. Our Lord, therefore, was dead during three night-and-days."

P. T., Ogdensburg, N. Y. What has been the most fatal disease to the human race and when and where did it occur?

The most fatal plague of history is that known as the "Black Death," a form of typhus which caused the body to turn black. In 1348 it swept the Old World from China to Ireland. In Europe alone 2,500,000 perished. London became a huge mortuary, 100,000 being carried off in a few weeks.

Miscellaneous

H. H., Coldwater, Kan. The passage in I. Peter 3: 19 is one which has been much discussed by commentators. It is generally interpreted as meaning that the preaching to the spirits "in prison" implies not the preaching of the Gospel, but the announcement of Christ's finished work. Nor does it imply a second day of grace.

R. B. F., Minden, Neb. A lie is a lie, no matter what the circumstances under which it is told may be. When it is not wise to tell the truth, it is better to say nothing. It might save trouble if the victim of a robber should say he had no money, when he really had money; but it would be an untruth nevertheless.

A. B. H., Winterport, Me. Daniel, King David's second son, born of Abigail, lived, as is supposed, about 1051 B.C. Daniel, a priest of the family of Ithamar, mentioned in Ezra 8: 2, lived about 459 B.C., and is presumably identical with the Daniel who joined in the covenant drawn up by Nehemiah (mentioned in Neh. 10: 6). He was called a "son of Ithamar" in the sense of being a priest of that family. The two need not be confused. Ithamar was the youngest son of Aaron, and, like his brothers, was consecrated to the priesthood, as were his descendants for many generations, who were called his "sons."

Subscriber, Provincetown, Mass. 1. The Peace party is facing a discouraging situation at present, but it is not losing hope. Its leaders believe that even though wars continue, they should still go on with their peace propaganda, and await God's good time for the world's full enlightenment. 2. The last six verses of Rev. 13 is a mystical description of Antichrist, and many interpreters believe it foreshadows the Papacy, which claims the double power, secular and spiritual. There has been an immense amount of speculative literature on the subject.

THE NICARAGUAN TURMOIL

NICARAGUA is once more in the throes of one of its periodic, geyser-like revolutions. It is only three years since the last upheaval of this sort, when a revolution against President Zelaya compelled him to flee to Mexico, and left two generals, [illegible]da and Madriz, to contend for the supremacy.

This time the revolutionists are out against Adolfo Diaz, who assumed the presidency after the period of unrest that followed the 1909 [illegible]olution. Under the direction of General Mena the sporadic fires of [illegible]surrection that have flamed more or less luridly for the past few months have now been united to form a conflagration that lights the entire country with anarchy and lawlessness. When Richard Harding Davis, a few years ago charmed us with his stories of the romance of Central American opera bouffe warfare, few realized how serious these petty struggles may become; how much suffering they may entail; how much destruction they are responsible for; or how, in the ever-changing kaleidoscope of the world's diplomatic relations, they may cause a most unpleasant charge to be laid at the door of a [illegible]nation, in fact, at our very own.

[illegible] weeks there came reports of petty battles and insurgent movements. It was not until late August, however, that the seriousness of revolt was realized [illegible]ashington. The disabling of [illegible]ailway line from Corinto on the [illegible]acific Coast to Managua and Granada was one of the first causes of [illegible]alarm for the lives and property of the Americans. Then came [illegible]interruption of telegraphic communication, and then came the [illegible]nited States marines from Panama. In the meantime, the rebels had bombarded Managua, the capital, and had besieged Corinto, Masaya and Matagalpa, reducing the last two almost to starvation before relief arrived. Days passed and no word came from the American and British subjects in the beleaguered towns. General Mena and his chief lieutenant, Francisco Baca, gained possession of the important towns of Leon and Granada. The lack of [illegible]ffice news rendered the situation all the more alarming, and President Taft ordered the Tenth United States Infantry Regiment to proceed from Panama to Nicaragua. This order was rescinded, however, just before the arrival of Rear Admiral William H. H. Southerland, who immediately assumed control of the [illegible]ast section of the coast.

The rear admiral, shortly after his arrival on the California, transferred his flag to the Annapolis, and sent the larger ship to Panama for 750 marines, who landed from the Prairie at Colon. The cruiser Denver he stationed at San Juan del Sur to keep order there and to protect the telegraph and cable station. Under orders from Rear Admiral Southerland, Commander Terhune and 500 marines were despatched inland to re-establish communicaton. They found rails torn up and bridges destroyed, telegraph lines cut, and buildings demolished along the railway. The malicious damage to the telegraph lines required a great deal of work and material to repair, but the marine electricians rushed it through, and within sixty hours a number of messages were despatched to the State Department at Washington. The repairs to the railway occupied practically two weeks. The placing of small garrisons of United States troops in the larger towns and the re-establishment of order along the railway quieted the activities of the rebels to a great extent. In spite of this, however, much uneasiness is felt both in diplomatic and commercial circles from the conviction that General Mena has suspended hostilities only under the pressure of superior force and that he is simply waiting a favorable opportunity to renew his aggressive campaign.

The Europeans throughout the country are appealing to their home governments for protection, but nothing definite in the way of a course of action has been agreed upon as yet. The United States is the only country to reckon with the situation so far, and as usual the action of our government is causing comment. At the present time this country has an armed force of some two thousand seven hundred men on Nicaraguan soil. Some of the European papers have not hesitated to state their belief that the policy the United States is pursuing is equivalent to putting a protectorate on the little republic. They sharply criticize our government for its intervention, charging that the State Department assists one side or the other according to the interests of the promoters of trade-seeking concessions. The critics say that this country should make clear its attitude towards all the Latin-American governments, especially the Central American republics, pointing out the fact that it cannot embroil itself in their revolutions without bringing down upon itself hostile comment and being accused of sinister motives in its interference. In the present instance the United States is being accused of having for its object the absolute control of Nicaragua in order to provide a safeguard against the eventual completion of the abandoned

NEWARK'S UNIQUE PLAYGROUND

IT'S a lucky lad who finds himself eligible to the Newark City Playgrounds, for they afford more amusement to the square inch than any other in the country, if the word of youthful enthusiasts is to be believed, since the system embraces many novel and unique features not to be found elsewhere. It is considered a model of its kind and to study it come educators from all parts of the country.

The Newark play centers, unlike those of other cities, are open the year round, summer and winter, and are free to old and young alike, so that from youth to middle age there are sports, amusements, classes and clubs suited to every taste. The daylight hours are given over to the younger element, after five o'clock to the older boys, many of whom before they were gathered into Supervisor McKiernan's fold chose the corner saloon for their nightly rendezvous, but are now leaders in all movements that make for civic righteousness, for the clever head of Newark's playground system is accounted a wizard in boy culture. Like Judge Ben Lindsey he believes boys are bad only for want of proper occupation and amusement.

While the Newark playground system possesses all the activities of other cities, with the exception of swimming pools, it has, in addition, such superlative attractions as free moving picture shows, playground orchestras, fife and drum corps, scout-craft, such as wigwagging, semaphore signaling, and instruction in the Morse and Continental Code for wireless telegraphy. As an object lesson in ethics, based on the fundamental principle of service for others, Supervisor McKiernan gives a home on the play centers to certain civic benevolences, such as babies' milk stations, free dental clinics, and a nursery for the better care and nourishment of the younger children.

One feature which has worked out beautifully in Newark is the self-government idea. Every play center, both for boys and girls, has its own mayor and common council, as well as other city departments, which operate, in a small way, after the same manner as those of the municipality. Boys of fourteen are organized into a police force after passing a civil sevice test, which, on some grounds, is quite as difficult as any the regulation police candidate is called upon to pass. Nevertheless many of the boys show averages of from 90 to 100 per cent. The youthful bluecoats police the grounds, and it is through this agency that Newark can make the proud boast that it has never had to call upon the regular police force for assistance at the playgrounds, and the importance of this can be better understood when it is explained that the moving pictures attract as many as ten thousand visitors at a time. In handling these crowds, the juvenile policemen take a hand, and they have been found more effective than the official bluecoats.

There are also playground courts, where trials are held before a juvenile judge, and youngsters who violate any of the playground rules are summoned to appear before this court for trial, and, if found guilty, are subjected to penalties, usually suspension from the playgrounds for any term from one hour to a month, according to the gravity or frequency of the offense. To keep the playgrounds neat and clean, a Board of Health, or Sanitary Squad, is appointed. Receptacles are placed on the grounds and into them go all waste and refuse, else complaints are lodged against the offenders, and, in case of a repetition of the offense, banishment from the grounds for a longer or a shorter period follows. To the youngsters who display the greatest efficiency in keeping the grounds clean, medals are awarded. It is incumbent on the Sanitary Squad, also, to prepare the grounds for athletic meets, digging the jumping-pits, laying out the running courses, and removing the litter which interferes with baseball. All this makes for individual responsibility.

On three of the playgrounds are amateur orchestras composed of boys, and on the Newton Street Playground is also a small string orchestra composed of girls. Fife and drum corps are a feature of each playground, and a combination of all the musicians furnish music for special occasions, particularly for Playground Day, which occurred on August 21.

First Aid to the Injured classes render prompt and effective assistance in case of accidents. Not only are the minor cuts and bruises of the ground children treated, but the fame of the teur physicians has spread abroad, so that quently they are called upon to treat men wh injured by machinery in the neighboring sho children hurt in the streets. "There is a doct the playground" is usually the information gratuitously by some youngster when an acc occurs, and in all possible haste the patient, seriously injured, is hurried to the spot wher First Aid boys can lend their services.

The moving pictures exhibited invariably educational subjects, and they depict the ra of the house-fly, the dangers of impure milk tragic results of unhealthy ments, methods for contr tuberculosis at home, and intensely practical series. rainy days, when the childre unable to be out of doors, are stereopticon displays i schoolrooms, with accompa talks on travel. The work girls is carried along on pa lines, and from the smallest the largest all have their and classes. There is occup work of a light and intere kind for the younger chil and domestic science, b making and the like for elder sisters.

In addition, the playgroun joice in boy scouts, their or zation, the Boys' Peace S antedating the present o federation by two years; air camps during the su months in connection with playgrounds; basket ball in ter; facilities for working and working boys to make t the grounds and recreation ters after workin hours. A are encouraged to make u the play centers, and this is aged without interfering wit activities of the children. patrons of the various cente organized into groups of clubs, classes, t ments and leagues, from the children of the k garten age to the married men.

So it will be seen that the contention of Ne folk that their playgrounds present a mo versified series of activities than most oth based on fact. Supervisor McKiernan, mor will tell you there is scarcely anything in the of recreation in the country that cannot be there. "With the exception of swimming p he says, "we have the distinction of being a in all recreation activities. Not only have we thing the combined playground systems have United States, but we are leaders in various of sport and amusement, which, first intro here, have since been widely copied all ove country."

And the secret of its success lies in the p ality of this plain, quiet-mannered man, who i of the Newark City Playground Commission.

Nicaraguan Canal, which would be a competitor with the Panama waterway. Despite these criticisms American lives and American interests must be protected in Nicaragua. There is yet danger, and while it remains there is a duty to perform toward those of our people who have embarked in business enterprises there.

In his latest despatch to the State Department Minister Weitzel declares that conditions are still grave, especially at Granada, where there is a possibility of both famine and fever. The inhabitants, he says, are in favor of constitutional government, but have been terrorized by General Mena, who holds the fort and military supplies, and has brought about a condition of abject suffering. Minister Weitzel also reports that President Diaz has sent a force of federal troops to Matagalpa, some eighty miles east of Managua, to protect foreign interests. Despite this move of the president, much concern is felt for the safety of some one hundred and twenty-five Americans at Matagalpa, and also a number of British subjects who have interests there. Diaz is so much incensed over Mena's violation of an armistice arranged by the Salvadorean minister that he refuses to enter into another such agreement with the rebel leader.

In a message dated August 28, the minister repeats his previous statements that outlawry is rampant and that the rebel leaders are unable to check violence against foreigners, even if they are disposed to do so. The Salvadorean minister at Managua, who was interned by the rebels at Leon upon his return to the capital, furnished the American minister with many facts regarding the gravity of the situation.

Danger of another attack on Managua has been lessened, it is believed by Minister Weitzel, by the capture of eighty thousand rounds of rapid fire cartridges from the rebels. The federals intercepted a convoy sent by General Mena from Granada to General Baca, commanding the rebel forces at Leon. The convoy was attacked near El Guayabal, and it is believed the loss of the ammunition will have the effect of temporarily checking the revolutionists in their depredations. It will take many weeks to get ammunition over the mountain and jungle passes leading from the east coast, and it is certain the American naval officers stationed on the Pacific side will not allow any to enter from that direction. Rear Admiral Southerland believes he has control of the situation at Corinto and San Juan del Sur.

The last despatches from the scene of the turmoil indicate that the American forces have to a large extent re-established order. The officers in charge of the force of marines along the railway e the opinion that they will have little trouble i tecting the railway property and maintaining munication between the capital and Corinto assuring advices have been received at the Department in Washington, D. C., from Rea miral Southerland regarding the situation Americans and other foreigners at Mata The federal forces seem to have been making headway during the last few days than earlier progress of the fight. The capture of a large ber of the rebel army is reported, and it is b that President Diaz's troops have succee separating the two divisions of the revolut and for the time being, at least, postponed an active aggression on the part of General Mer

CHINA'S INDUSTRIAL PROBLEM

BY EMILY S. HARTWELL, FOOCHOW

T WAS at a Sunday afternoon Christian Endeavor meeting of women in Foochow City, 1899. Opposite me sat a Chinese woman, the tears coursing down her cheeks from eyes that e swollen with long weeping. At the close of the rice the Bible-woman and others begged me to two doors distant and see the go-between who waiting to close the bargain to buy the weeping man's children.

I have come to your class and learned God ented these children to me," the woman gasped out ween her sobs, "to bring m up for heaven; but they starving. The only way have them fed is to sell m! Their father was a d-working man and always ught home his money, but year the cholera seized and in one short day he s in his coffin, Ai-ah! Ai-ah! ave sold his house and rything, and nothing is left these starving children, girls and two boys. The s cry and will not leave me. told me I must love the s as much as the boys. s baby boy does not under-nd, so he must go first, but ah! Ai-ah! it will kill me to him! What will become his soul sold off to a then? I cannot, cannot let go!" and she burst into ther paroxysm.

That is just the way she been going for days," exined the Bible-woman. "She killing herself with grief!"

What would you do? Do send us missionaries to na to teach Christ and n stand by and see women their children? And yet I ed not ask a Missionary rd to help me save them. Without a cent hand, I then and there promised those girls seven and nine they should not be sold, l I went home to pray for money to be sent When we put our shoulders under others' dens in this way and let the burden crush, we rn the meaning of the promise, "The Lord hear-the needy when they cry."

This was not all. There were two older boys, apprenticed in an opium shop. His mother rned that was sin and took him home, but his ironment had already poisoned him. He would study—the only thing the Missions provide for. went into a medicine shop belonging to a family t soon moved to Singapore, as Foochow is over-pulated. Removed from his mother, the boy used his money and failed to write home; but er years of our prayers he must have been ched, for he bought a steerage ticket and started k to Foochow. He died on the way, leaving his ther's address, with the message, "I am the son a Christian. Tell my mother I tried to get back her." This is the fate of many a lad who was born to be a scholar, but for whom the Chris-na have no other provision. The other older son s most ambitious and thoroughly good. His em-yer's business failed and he studied ht and day, determined to become a olar; but his brain was not equal to He might have made a good artisan. The eldest girl was not a student er but finished the preparatory ool. She married a day school teacher o died of plague, and now, with a little daughter of her own, she teaches for their support. The second daughter was needed at home, as the mother never recovered from those days of weeping. This daughter studied only half a day and worked half a day. She is now an assistant in the industrial school of weaving and apparently well and strong. The two younger boys are learning trades with non-Christians, waiting for the Christian Industrial School we are asking funds to create.

Many a time I have stopped at a door to inquire the cause of the screams of a child. "My boy has run home from the shop and refuses to go back, so I must beat him," would be the answer. "He must be up at dawn to bring water, and work all day until eleven at night. It is terrible for him, but I cannot keep him at home to starve."

The Hill at Pagoda Anchorage, Available for an Industrial Plant

Do you wonder why the Chinese Christians feel that the industrial training for their children is the greatest need of New China?

After the appeal for the starving millions of the Yangtse in 1908-9 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD entrusted orphanage funds to the Chinkiang Orphanage Committee. Funds for two hundred children were secured for Foochow. Funds were also granted for buildings and two foreign houses. Five Chinese houses, together with land for a large garden, but appropriate for a future building site, have been secured. The first boy received had been the nephew of an opium eater, both parents having died. His debased uncle, after having sold his house, stole the doors, windows and floors, and resold them. Finally only the nephew was left. For him the uncle must receive the highest possible price. Opium leads one to sell wife, child, even one's own soul's only hope for eternity, for his craving. The boy went to the theater company, as they pay the largest price, for all know this means basest degradation of morals. The neighbors, although heathen, were indignant to have this boy sold to such a life, and they collected a purse, larger than the one paid for him, and reclaimed him; but who was to feed him afterward? Their own children were unaerfed, so they trusted him to us as soon as they heard of the opportunity.

Of the two hundred children taken, very few were girls. We found that in the poorest homes the girls had been sold, given away or drowned. Of the boys a few should be students and will have ample facilities in mission colleges, but most need industrial training. This need is immediate, for the homes opened January, 1910, with the larger proportion from eleven to thirteen years of age. These boys are now two years older and should begin to learn their trade at once.

At Pagoda Anchorage, the harbor for all large steamers coming to Foochow, a fine hill, with water front and buildings sufficient to house one hundred boys, is offered for sale. This adjoins the Standard Oil plant and is near the Dutch Petroleum Works, proving its choice location and its safety by reason of foreign gunboats in case of war. This fine site is offered now, hence the immediate need of funds.

The American nation needs to be friendly with China, which is becoming more and more our "next door neighbor." With the late revolution, and China bankrupt as at present—as a leading business man expressed it—"a million invested to help China to-day will be worth more than ten million ten years from now." Help given in her day of extremity will never be forgotten. China already looks upon America as her best friend. Secretary Hay led with the "open door" policy and thwarted the plan to partition China. America refunded its share of the Boxer indemnity, and it is to be used to help educate in our colleges the Chinese youth who are to create the young republic. Vast assistance has been rendered by the great universities and colleges planted in China by Americans—the Peking University and North China Girls' College, the St. John's University and Anglo-Chinese College of Shanghai, the Boone University of Wuchang, Yale Mission of Changsha and the Anglo-Chinese College and Foochow College of Foochow and the Canton Christian University, with many others.

Then, too, China appreciates the help of our government, which issued the call for the first International Opium Commission, that led Britain to begin to withdraw opium after over sixty years of traffic in the drug. We of Foochow are proud of Commissioner Lin, who hurled $6,000,000 worth of opium into Hongkong Harbor after mixing it with quicklime. Are not such people worth helping?

And last we come to the unique but stupendous problem—an entire race of people, the Manchus, turned out of employment. For over two hundred years the Manchus kept their own people, a military class, supported by stipends paid by the Chinese. This stung the

THE SUNSHINE OF CHRISTIANITY

A SERMON

BY

Rev. John H. C. Fritz *

TEXT: Luke 10: 17-20

THE Christian life is a life of joy and good cheer. The Christian, of course, having yet the old sinful flesh and because he yet has it, experiences also a measure of sorrow, but sorrow is not the predominant note of the Christian life. Sorrow, in fact, does not mar the Christian's joy, but rather helps, under the wise dispensation of God, to prove the Christian's joy to be real and lasting. "We glory in tribulations also," says the apostle. To the man sick of the palsy Jesus said, "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee." We Christians ought to cultivate a life of joy. Our Christian joy is not counterfeit and passing like the joy of the world. The joys of the world are like so many sky-rockets, which shoot up with much noise, present a most beautiful appearance, and, for the time being, seem to put the very stars in the skies to utter shame, but last only for a moment and then are no more, while the stars shine brightly on. The joys of the world resemble the mountain stream, which, during a rainstorm, swells to tremendous proportions, overflows its banks, and takes, perhaps, everything in its path, but, after all, is only so much turbulent and muddy water, which soon flows away and is gone, leaving ruin behind it, while the little river of the plain, with its bright and clear water, flows steadily on.

The Joy of "The Seventy"

We ask, "What is the real cause of the Christian's joy?" Our Saviour tells us. We read, "And the seventy returned again with joy." Who were the seventy? Where had they been? What had they been doing? What was the cause of their joy? The seventy were the Lord's disciples, whom he had chosen, besides the twelve apostles, and sent out "two and two before his face into every city and place, whither he himself would come." The seventy had now returned, having been in the places whither the Lord had sent them, having preached the Gospel of salvation, having healed the sick, and having driven out the very devils from such as were bodily afflicted with them. The seventy returned "with joy." Their mission had been successful, their work had not been done in vain. More than anything else they rejoiced in the fact that, not in their own name but in the name of Christ, they had cast out the evil spirits. They had done more than the apostles, of whom just before it had been reported that they were helpless to free a demoniac boy, for his father came to Jesus and complained, saying, "I besought thy disciples to cast him out and they could not."

Before the Lord withdrew from us his visible presence, ascending to heaven, he gave this command to his church, his disciples, saying, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." We Christians have experienced that this our work done in the Lord has not been done in vain. We have seen the fortifications of Satan destroyed and the Church of God grow and prosper. Those few disciples in the time of Christ have increased to many millions. Wherever the Gospel is preached souls are being saved. This has been, and is, a cause for great joy unto us. And when an old drunkard or a gambler or an adulterer or any unusual enemy of Christ has been converted through our services, we think such fruits of our labors to be a special cause for joy, and they are.

When the seventy had returned to their Lord who had sent them and reported that they had cast out the evil spirits, Jesus "said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven." "What you tell me," said Jesus, "is nothing new nor surprising to me; I have seen not only the devils conquered, but Satan, the very chief of the devils, fall from his position to the very depths of hell, even as lightning falls from heaven." The power of Satan had been broken and his final overthrow and the redemption of man was already an assured fact. Jesus had come into the world to destroy the devil and his works. As a result of the Saviour's work, the disciples would have their experience, which caused them so much joy, repeated many times. "Behold, I give unto you power," said Jesus, "to tread on serpents and scorpions and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any means hurt you." The disciples were told not to fear, for they would be able successfully to fight against the spiritual powers of evil.

This same glorious promise is given unto us. We have by faith in Christ been given power over the world of darkness. Strong as the devil is, we by faith in Jesus are stronger. We have nothing at all to fear. Nothing shall be able to hurt us. We can triumphantly exclaim with Paul, "If God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? . . . I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Not Success But Salvation

But listen! After all, the Saviour says, "Notwithstanding in this rejoice not that the spirits are subject unto you, but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven." The real cause of the Christian's joy is not the success which he meets in his work in the Lord's kingdom, but the fact that his name is written in heaven, inscribed upon the Book of Life; in other words, the Christian should rejoice above all else in the fact that his soul is saved. The salvation of our soul, though, is due alone to the grace of God in Christ, and not in the least to anything that we can glory in. This very fact teaches us not only to give all honor to God alone, but also gives us positive assurance that our soul is saved; God is not only the Author but also the Finisher of our faith. Of the salvation of our soul we can be absolutely certain, and our own personal salvation in Christ being the real cause of our joy, we can always rejoice. Our work done in the Lord will prove to be successful in the end according to the Lord's own promise, but there are times when the success is not as great as at other times, and times when the success is not apparent at all. If we made our success in the Lord's work, therefore, the real cause for our joy, our joy would be subject to variations; in fact, it would, at times, leave us. As it is, when our work in the kingdom of God is hard and there are many difficulties to overcome; when, at times, Satan seems to have been turned loose anew; when all manner of reverses in life turn up; when trouble and sickness and death come; then we are braced up, encouraged, comforted, by this one fact, that by the grace of God our names are written in heaven; that we are the children of the heavenly Father; that we shall be eternally saved. In turn, we are then also encouraged to go on with the work of the Lord, knowing that unto us, who are the children of God, is given the promise that our work done in the Lord shall not be in vain, that we shall go on gaining victory upon victory until the last battle is won and the Captain of our salvation returns in glory to take unto himself all that have loved his name, to rest in the eternal mansions above.

"God So Loved the World"

"Rejoice, because your names are written in heaven." So said the Saviour to his disciples, and thereby has told not only what should be but what in fact is the real cause of the Christian's joy. Is your name written in heaven? Is your name found in the "book of life"? In other words, are you sure of your eternal salvation? Thank God, the Christian can and should rejoice in the absolute certainty of his election unto eternal life. Jesus would have his disciples believe, and not doubt, that "their names were written in heaven," and because of this fact would have them to "rejoice." Paul spoke of his fellow-laborers, "whose names are in the book of life." Paul himself was persuaded that nothing could separate him and his fellow-Christians "from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Paul would have the Ephesian Christians believe that they were "chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world." John would not only have Christians believe that now they are the "sons of God," but also that when "Christ shall appear" they "shall be like him, for they shall see him as he [illegible] Paul in his earthly trials was comforted by the v[illegible] assurance of his future heavenly glory, for he s[illegible] "I reckon that the sufferings of this present t[illegible] are not worthy to be compared with the glory wh[illegible] shall be revealed in us." Whereupon did these children of God base th[illegible] firm faith of the glory which was awaiting th[illegible] and whereupon shall every Christian base his s[illegible] hope that his name is written in heaven? Upon [illegible] promise of God which cannot fail. "With everl[illegible] ing kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith [illegible] Lord thy Redeemer. . . . The mountains sl[illegible] depart and the hills be removed; but my kindn[illegible] shall not depart from thee, neither shall the co[illegible] nant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord t[illegible] hath mercy on thee." Wherein does the kindn[illegible] of the Lord consist, and what is the covenant of [illegible] peace? Listen! You are by nature a sinner un[illegible] the curse of God. God's holy law, which 'ema[illegible] holiness and perfection in thoughts, words, [illegible] deeds, you have transgressed. "The wages of si[illegible] death," eternal damnation. But "God so loved [illegible] world," you and all others included, "that he g[illegible] his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth [illegible] him should not perish, but have everlasting li[illegible] "God sent forth his Son to redeem them that w[illegible] under the law." "Christ died for the ungodl[illegible] "Jesus died for all." "Jesus is the propitiation [illegible] the sins of the whole world." Jesus is "the Lamb[illegible] God which taketh away the sins of the wor[illegible] Jesus came to "save that which was lost." Pe[illegible] expressly says that even those have been "boug[illegible] with the blood of the Son of God, who deny [illegible] Lord and thus bring upon themselves swift destr[illegible] tion. Because the Lord has so dearly paid for [illegible] redemption of all, therefore he has commanded t[illegible] this Gospel, this good news of salvation by grace [illegible] Christ, should be preached in "all the world" [illegible] "to every creature." "God will have all men to[illegible] saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth[illegible] "As I live, saith the Lord God," as we read in [illegible] Book of Ezeziel, "I have no pleasure in the death [illegible] the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his w[illegible] and live." Therefore the Lord "now command[illegible] all men everywhere to repent."

Unto You, Salvation in Christ

The Gospel offers to all unto whom it is preach[illegible] their free salvation in Christ. Unto you u[illegible] whom this Gospel is preached your salvation is [illegible] fered. To come into its possession you need t[illegible] believe the Gospel, the good news that Jesus is y[illegible] Saviour. Your works cannot justify you, for [illegible] him that worketh is the reward not reckoned [illegible] grace but of debt. But to him that worketh not [illegible] believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, [illegible] faith is counted for righteousness." To t[illegible] woman, that notorious sinner, who repented and [illegible] lieved, the Lord said, "Thy faith hath saved th[illegible] Go in peace." "Being justified by faith, we h[illegible] peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, [illegible] whom also we have access by faith into this gr[illegible] wherein we stand and rejoice in hope of the gl[illegible] of God." "With boldness we enter into the holi[illegible] by the blood of Jesus" and draw near unto G[illegible] "with a true heart in full assurance of faith," s[illegible] positively know that we shall have "boldness in [illegible] day of judgment," assured that our "names [illegible] written in heaven."

Is your name written in heaven? Have you a[illegible] good reason to doubt the many precious and g[illegible] cious promises of God? Certainly not. Co[illegible] then, repent of your sins and by faith in Jesus [illegible] cept the forgiveness which by his blood he procu[illegible] for you. Then also unto you he speaks the co[illegible] forting words, "Thy faith hath saved thee. Go[illegible] peace." Rejoice, because your name is written[illegible] heaven." Then your life even here below ami[illegible] the sorrows of sin will be a life of joy and g[illegible] cheer; your body and possessions and your serv[illegible] you will give to Christ, and in turn you will go u[illegible] others and proclaim to them by word and deed t[illegible] Gospel which has saved your soul, that they m[illegible] partake of that real joy which is found in Je[illegible] alone. To him, with the Father and the Ho[illegible] Ghost, we give honor and glory now and everm[illegible] for through his grace we rejoice in the fact that [illegible] names are written in heaven.

THE FALL O' THE YEAR

HE fall o' the year has come back again,
And it's jest as delightful as't ever has been,
th the odors o' apples and must o' the grape,
d the leaves all colored jest any old shape, d plaintive Bob White whistles merriest when e fall o' the year has come back again!

e fall o' the year has come back again,
d I let down the bars o' the stubble field then,
d hie me away to the woods and the wold, here the leaves are all purple, the weeds are of gold;
d somehow or other—jest how, I can't tell—caught in the maze of a mystical spell;
d the breeze as it whispers in both o' my ears, ings back to me visions o' faraway years;
d I'm happy and sad both together jest when
e fall o' the year has come back again!

e fall o' the year has come back again,
d the weather jest sizzles no longer like sin,
d the trees in the distance are hazy and brown,
d the lazy old cattle are standing aroun'; d I love jest to bask in sich halcyon days,
d throw away trouble that on my soul weighs;
ey tinge up the future with some sort o' hope,
e seeing the things in a ka-leidoscope, d I love all around me the tenderest when
e fall o' the year has come back again!

A Singer of Sacred Songs

F ALL the really beautiful sacred songs of modern times, few have ade a stronger appeal to the spiri-al natures of men and women, boys d girls, than the songs entitled, "I ve to Tell the Story" and "Whiter an Snow." These songs, so rich in mfort and hopefulness, were writ-n by William Gustavus Fischer, who ed at his home in Philadelphia on ugust 14. He was also the author the hymn, "I Am Trusting, Lord, in ee," and of the song that countless ousands of Sunday-school children ve sung, "A Little Talk with Jesus." is doubtful if any Sunday-school ng of recent years has been sung re than "I Love to Tell the Story," d it has been one of the most popu-r of songs at great revival meetings. r. Fischer often led thousands of gers when they were singing this d other of his songs. He was leader the music when Moody and Sankey ld their remarkable revival meet-gs in the old freight depot in Phila-lphia. Mr. Fischer was then in his ime, and the work he and his chorus one thousand singers did will never forgotten by those who attended ese wonderful meetings. Some of e songs written by Mr. Fischer will sung as long as the Christian world aises God in song. M. M. M.

How to Find Success

HAT you may find success," said Rev. Charles Brooks in an address boys, "let me tell you how to suc-ed. To-night, begin your great plan life. You have but one life to live, d it is immeasurably important at you do not make a mistake. To-ght, begin carefully. Fix your eye the fortieth year of your age, and en say to yourself: 'At the age of rty, I will be a temperate man; I ll be an industrious man; an eco-omical man; a benevolent man; a ell-read man; a religious man; and useful man; I will be such an one; resolve and I will stand to it.' My ung friends, let this resolution be as m as adamantine; let it stand like e oak which cannot be wind-aken."

The foregoing extract comes to us om Mrs. E. B. Bradbury, Auburn, e., accompanied by this note: "I pe you will give it a place in THE HRISTIAN HERALD. It was found nong a precious brother's effects, atly pasted in an expense book. A ung man in college (to whom I had ven a copy) wrote me, 'If I ever at-in success, it will be because of this solution.'"

THE MORE ABUNDANT LIFE AND THE CRIPPLED LIFE

OW fine a thing it is to strive after a more abundant life! It is one of the "best gifts" which we are told to covet earnestly. Life offers us so much, if only we can grasp it. The realm we may occupy is so broad and so rich, it is a pitiful thing to be shut out from it and to have our lives crippled, and narrowed, and impoverished.

Some years ago a young man secured a modest position in a great business institution. He worked hard and won promotion. Step by step he pushed his way upward, gaining larger responsibilities and increased income. At length he reached the highest place and became president of the concern. All the wide interests of the business were under his control. A multitude of workers moved at his command. His influence was felt in countless other enterprises. Captains of industry consulted him and sought his aid. From a small beginning he had grown rich and powerful, and as he moved in his masterful way among men, enforcing his will and counting the abundance of his possessions and the fulness of his power he seemed to say, in the words of Monte Cristo, "The world is mine!"

A young woman was graduated from a college and entered eagerly the open door of an attractive world. All that was good seemed to beckon to her and promise a life full and brimming over with its best gifts. She married happily, and then life grew richer. In her children she found the supreme blessing, as she thought, and the hope of the most abundant and joyous life. Suddenly she was stricken with illness, terrible in its complete devastation of all her hopes. The physicians could do nothing. She was condemned to lie helpless, suffering and incurable, shut in her room while the world bustled on outside, and she could never see it again.

WHICH of these two had gained the more abundant life, and which was the crippled life? Curiously enough, the true answer is not the obvious one, for "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of things which he possesseth."

The man of power and wealth cared nothing for books or music. His family were lavishly provided for, but were almost strangers to him. The whispering trees, the fragrance of wild flowers and new mown hay, the songs of lark and thrush, the quiet peace of the fields, and the deep mysteries of the blue sky overhead, all were unknown to him. Life was all an everpressing NOW. Money and power were the only things worth while. Other men and women were useful as they could be made to contribute to his steady increase of these things. They were to be pushed aside, crushed if need be, when they hindered him. No children ran to him with wide open arms and shouts of laughter. No sighs were hushed, no tears wiped away, no hearts encouraged by his influence. His wealth and his power might have been used to fill the world with joy, but he lived a miserable, selfish, crippled life.

The poor sick woman lay for a while rebellious at her weakness and pain and the spoiling of all her high hopes. But her life was still strong and pure within her. In time she yielded and became reconciled. Then in her narrow room she lifted up her heart in which the eagerness for good still throbbed, and she said, "Lord, I am cast down, but not destroyed. Though the outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. Lord, in my weakness, and my loneliness, and my pain, what wilt thou have me to do?"

And a strange answer came to this stricken woman, shut in a small room away from the world: "Lovest thou me? Feed my sheep." She did not exclaim in protest and surprise. She did not say that others must do the work because she could never again go out to find the sheep who were hungry. She just smiled, but it was a smile of such brightness that the nurse looked and wondered. When her husband came, heavy-hearted and full of unshed tears, the smile lifted some of the bitter load from off his heart. When the children tip-toed into the room, fearful and silent, the smile flooded them with its brightness and made them happier than they had been for months.

Such a smile could never be shut up in one small room. It spread more and more. It brought smiles to other sad faces. It brought gladness into other sad hearts. It lifted up drooping spirits and gave strength to burden-bearers. To tell of the breadth and the fulness of its ministry would need a great book and the testimony of many witnesses.

HOW can we gain the more abundant life and avoid the crippled life? To the man and the woman who feels strong and free and confident of mastery the question is as urgent as to the one who suffers from unnatural restrictions. Rather, it is more urgent to him that has much, because from him much shall be required. Certainly the abundant life is gained not by heaping up treasure for self, but by putting something into other lives. But how may the life that seems to be crippled, or restricted by narrow duties, or limited by small abilities, be transformed?

The other day the newspapers printed a pitiful wail from a woman stricken, in the full tide of young motherhood, with a strange malady that paralyzed her from the neck down. In her pain and hopelessness she cried out for death and begged the State to end her misery. Every one who read the sad story must have felt a yearning pity and desire to help. Is there any help for such as she? Is there any Great Physician who can say now to the sick of the palsy, "Arise"?

In the same column of the newspaper, immediately following the account of this paralytic, was a short item telling of a woman who had just celebrated her eighty-ninth birthday, and who had spent more than three-quarters of a century as a shut-in. When a child of eleven, she had injured her spine and never walked again. Most of her long, crippled life had been rendered more abundant by knitting and sewing things for missionary workers in foreign fields, and by spreading an atmosphere of sunshine and good cheer among all who visited her.

But the stricken woman who cannot use her hands? If her body cannot arise may not the Great Physician in his love say to her broken spirit, "Arise!" Somehow, sometime, somewhere, there may be a glad and abundant life even for her.

REMEMBRANCE

WHEN the grass shall cover me,
Head to foot where I am lying;
When not any wind that blows,
Summer blooms nor winter snows,
Shall awake me to your sighing;
Close above me as you pass,
You will say, "How kind she was!"
You will say, "How true she was!"
When the grass grows over me.

When the grass shall cover me,
Holden close to earth's warm bosom—
While I laugh or weep or sing
Never more, for anything,
You will find in blade and blossom,
Sweet, small voices, odorous,
Tender pleaders in my cause,
That shall speak me as I was—
When the grass grows over me.

When the grass shall cover me!
Ah! beloved, in my sorrow
Very patient, I can wait,
Knowing that, or soon or late,
There will dawn a clearer morrow;
When your heart will mourn, "Alas!
Now I know how true she was;
Now I know how dear she was"—
When the grass grows over me!

Awakening in Bulgaria

IN CONNECTION WITH the various Protestant churches in Bulgaria and Macedonia, there have been organized Christian Endeavor Societies, Epworth Leagues and Young Men's Christian Associations, according as local needs have required. There are now thirty such organizations in Bulgaria and Macedonia. Two years ago they formed a national union, of which the second conference has just closed in Sofia. This conference was a sign of the times in Bulgaria.

Morally and spiritually Bulgaria has not been moving very fast. The Greek Orthodox state church is upheld as a political institution, but as a means for the spiritual elevation of the people it has been utterly useless. Materialism and infidelity have taken a strong hold, especially of the youth. Such religious organizations as those above-mentioned are badly needed.

In spite of this tendency, however, of the many conferences of all sorts held in Sofia during the summer months none could gather such audiences as did the National Union of the Young People's Christian Societies. The national poet Stoyan Mihailovsky one evening addressed the conference on the subject, "The Regenerating Principles in Christianity as Compared with Other Religions." Mr. Mihailovsky is not a Protestant, but is a believer, and by his writings and lectures is doing much in upholding the religious spirit among the Bulgarians. It was his first address delivered in a Protestant church and the auditorium was filled to its utmost capacity.

As a result of Dr. John Mott's visit in the spring, we have now in the Sofia University a students' Young Men's Christian Association, a thing which I deemed impossible ten years ago, when Dr. Mott for the first time stopped in Sofia for a half day's stay to look over the field. Now some forty students have enrolled in the Bible classes. The sales of the Scriptures are unprecedented.

The annual meeting of the Bulgarian Evangelical Society was held in Bourgas on the coast of the Black Sea. Fifteen years ago in that city there was only one Protestant family; now there is a flourishing church. The largest public hall in the city was opened for our meetings and they were always overcrowded. This is only one of the many indications of the great change which the Gospel is making in Bulgaria.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

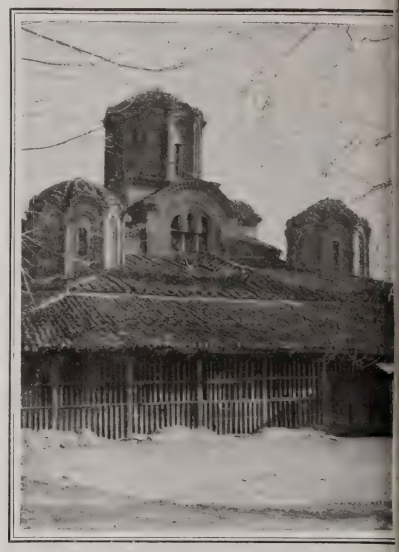
TURNING THE WORLD UPSIDE DOWN

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

The Ruins of the Roman Triumphal Arch at Salonica

In a Macedonian Sheepfold



The Church of the Twelve Apostles, Salonica

IT HAS been said that the book of the Acts of the Apostles has made Macedonia a Holy Land. Since Thessalonica is the chief city of Macedonia, the city where the apostles had their greatest triumphs, and from which the Gospel spread most widely into all the world, we may call it the Holy City of the Acts of the Apostles. It is then well worth consideration in another article. Indeed, many articles would not exhaust its past glories, its present interest, or its importance in the history of the Christian Church.

In writing to the Thessalonians from Corinth, the first epistle, by the way, which St. Paul wrote to any of his churches, he says: "From you [the church of Thessalonica] sounded out the word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia [Greece], but also in every place, your faith to Godward is spread abroad." We have other testimony from the book of Acts as to the marvelous effect of the preaching of Paul and Silas in Thessalonica, for we are told also that not only some of the Jews believed, but a great multitude of the "devout Greeks as well, and not a few of the chief women." Even from the enemies of Paul we have confirmation of the extent of the work they performed and the commotion it caused, for they complained to the rulers of Thessalonica that "these that have turned the world upside down have come hither also."

Therefore let us linger a little longer in this holy city of the Acts and the Epistles. In a previous article we have walked through one of the busy modern streets of the city, where the clanging electric cars of the most modern day jostle the pannier-laden donkeys of the oldest civilization. Such a street as this we might find in Athens or Trieste, in New York or London. But go back from this modern thoroughfare a few rods, and we are in a city which we can easily imagine was not unlike the Thessalonica that Paul knew. The narrow streets, with their horrible cobblestone paving; the ancient houses that nod to each other across the way, whose inhabitants can shake hands from the upper windows; the public fountains, where for centuries barefooted maidens have come with great earthen jars to draw water; the thousand-year-old wall that circles the upper town; all remind us of the city that was, rather than of the city that is.

But the most interesting street of all is the one which Paul knew as well as the most recent comer to Salonica in this twentieth century. It is none other than the Egnatian Way, which to-day runs through the very heart of Salonica, as two thousand years ago it ran through the heart of old Thessalonica. The houses on either side, to be sure, have been built and rebuilt, and demolished and restored, time and again since Paul's time. But these ancient highways have followed the same lines for century after century. Doubtless the old Roman pavement is covered many feet with modern débris, but that this was the route of the most famous road ever built is proved by the triumphal arch of which I have before spoken and which still spans the Via Egnatia as in the days of St. Paul.

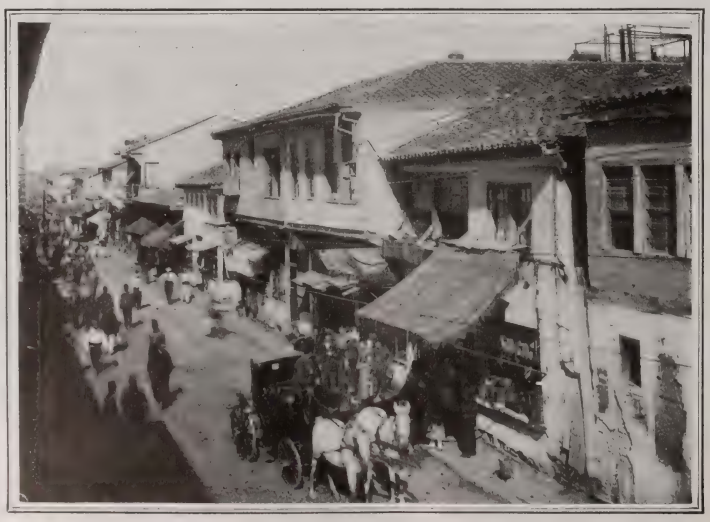
Though the beautiful, sculptured marbles which once covered this arch of victory have recently been removed and taken to the museum in Constantinople, some traces of its former magnificence still remain. Only a few years ago the traveler might have seen upon this arch the figures of the consuls in their long togas, and have read the inscription in Greek letters that told every passerby that the victorious Romans had made Thessalonica a free city, and that the rulers were seven politarchs, as the magistrates of Thessalonica were called. Even their names were given, and it is thought that Politarch Secundus may have been Paul's friend of the same name. The name "politarch" was an unusual one for the rulers of a city, and the minute accuracy of St. Luke's account is shown by his use of this word, which puzzled the commentators until the inscription on this Roman arch was discovered, to prove that Luke knew what he was talking about better than the commentators who criticized him.

This ancient street is to-day, as then, the busiest in all Salonica. It is the Broadway, the Washington Street, the Friedrichstrasse, the Strand of the modern city, as it was of old Thessalonica. It is lined with shops of all sorts and sizes, butcher shops and restaurants, barber shops and bakeries, fruit stores and tobacco shops. In fact, you can scarcely think of a trade or profession or business house that is not represented on the modern Via Egnatia of Salonica.

As the Orientals do their work in the open far more than the people of Western countries, the Via Egnatia, now called the Rue de Vardar, is even a livelier place in some respects than its counterparts which I have mentioned, for you do not have to go into a store to buy your goods, since the merchant in many cases brings them out on the side walk to tempt you, and cooking, and tailoring, and hair-cutting and shoemaking go on under the very eyes of every passerby.

Until recently the lordly camel trod the Egnatian Way as solemnly and superciliously as in the days of St. Paul, but now he is seldom seen, for the railway and the trolley car have banished him to the interior cities of Macedonia.

In our recent journey we wished to follow the footsteps of St. Paul on his first journey from Philippi to Thessalonica, so far as we could, under modern conditions of travel. So we left the Salonica railway station, with its crowd of officials and loafers and would-be passengers and sweet-meat sellers one bright morning, for Drama the nearest station on the railway for old Philippi. We were traveling in the opposite direction from that which St. Paul took, to be sure, and we could not follow his exact route, but the modern railway which connects Salonica with Constantinople traverses the same general region of country and gives us a very realizing sense of what the apostle must have seen.



A Scene on the Via Egnatia, the Great Highway Between Rome and Constantinople

It is an exceedingly mountainous region. Soon the traveler bids good-by to towering Olympus, but his smaller brethren are never out of sight, and they are small only by comparison with the monarch of them all. In many countries these Macedonian hills would be considered mighty mountains. They are usually steep and bare, never clothed with large forests, but at the best only scantily covered with underbrush.

Between the mountains we see fine valleys of fertile soil and pastures that support thousands of cattle and buffaloes, sheep and lambs. Here

"LABOR DAY" AT MONT-LAWN

THREE hundred and thirty little tenement children and a large number of visitors joined in the Labor Day celebration at Mont-Lawn on September 2. This holiday is always one of the delightful events of the season at our Children's Home, and this year was no exception to the rule. Never did the "Children's Paradise" look more attractive.

Shortly before noon the guests began to arrive by train and boat, and there was a goodly number present when the children assembled to march to Port Plenty for dinner. Every seat in the great dining-room held a tiny occupant. The visitors were delighted with everything they saw, and after hearing the children sing the opening grace, they passed up and down the aisles between the dining-tables chatting with them and speaking encouraging words. The big kitchen, the dormitories, the chapel and all the beauties and attractions of the place were duly inspected by the visitors, many of whom had come there for the first time.

After dinner there was a short intermission, and Matron Goering gave the signal for the march to the Children's Temple for the "Hour of Song." This was an occasion of more than usual interest, for Messrs. Tullar and Meredith, the well-known sacred song writers and evangelists, had come to the Home expressly for the purpose of conducting the exercises. Every seat in the Temple was filled, and the ambulatory gallery and platform were packed with visitors. After the opening hymn and the invocation by the Rev. Dr. Fish, of the Presbyterian Church of Nyack, Tullar and Meredith took charge of the services, and an hour of perfect enjoyment followed. Song after song from the children's leaflets was sung with fine effect. Mr. Meredith taught the children two new pieces, which they took up with amazing readiness. Then Mr. Tullar gave a short Gospel address and astonished the little folks with his skill in tearing pieces of paper, which under his nimble fingers assumed various wonderful forms; one of them, a beautiful yet simple pattern symbolizing Christ as our Pattern; another was a pilot's wheel, from which he also drew a spiritual lesson; and a third was three crosses, which told the story of Calvary.

When the "Glory Song" was rendered, Mr. Meredith leading, a surprise awaited the evangelist. Never was it sung with better effect by the hundreds of fresh young voices. At its conclusion, Mr. Meredith said he had heard it sung by audiences numbering thousands of voices in England and this country, but the singing of that song by our children at Mont-Lawn had given him far greater pleasure than any of these, and he thanked them heartily for it. It was a fine tribute to Professor Noll, to whose skilful training the Mont-Lawn children owe their success in sacred and patriotic song.

Rev. Dr. Babbitt, the venerable rector of Grace Episcopal Church of Nyack, took part in the services in the Temple, together with the Rev. Mr. Moore, his assistant.

Then came an hour or more devoted to the children's sports on the green lawn, which included a number of features for which the little folks had been training during the week. Athletics, games, songs and various other amusements made the afternoon pass pleasantly. On parting, the visitors united in declaring that the day had been one of perfect enjoyment. Mrs. Louis Klopsch, the patroness of the Home, was present throughout the day and received many congratulations from the guests on the success of the occasion.

All contributions, large or small, in aid of the work of our Children's Home will be gratefully received and acknowledged.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—FLOODS CAUSED BY a terrific rainstorm raging through the night of September 1 and 2 in the neighborhood of Pittsburg resulted in the death of at least forty persons, the loss of much livestock and the destruction of approximately two million dollars' worth of property. The storm-covered area included parts of Pennsylvania, Eastern Ohio and West Virginia. Many buildings were struck by lightning; others were washed away in the quickly flooded streams. Fields filled with flourishing crops were devastated. At Scott Run, near Wellsburg, W. Va., a freight train on the Wabash Railroad jumped the track and most of the cars rolled into the swollen torrents of Cross Creek. At Pittsburg the rainfall was reported to have been five inches. Street car traffic was stopped, many belated passengers being forced to spend the night in the car-barns to which the trolleys were run for shelter. Railway traffic and telegraph communication was blocked; one thousand men were despatched from Pittsburg to repair the tracks between that city and Wheeling, W. Va. The town of Salesville, O., suffered severely. Houses were washed away, the electric light plant badly injured, the water system ruined and the natural gas system rendered useless by the floods. Cherry Valley, Burgettstown, Cannonsburg and Avella also suffered severely. At one coal mine prompt action on the part of the management brought 400 men to the surface who were in danger from the floods. At Avella Rev. B. F. Henny proved himself a hero by rescuing a woman and two children who were clinging to a tree surrounded by raging water. He made eight unavailing efforts to reach the tree with a rope before he succeeded. All were finally drawn to safety, including the brave clergyman. Prompt measures were taken by Governor Harmon and others to rush food and supplies to the flood sufferers. In Michigan and Wisconsin there were serious floods at the same time. Three lives were lost at Hustler, Wis., and railroad traffic was badly impeded.

—ON JANUARY 1 the Post Office Department will put in general operation the parcels post system authorized in the postal appropriation bill, which became a law on August 24. Under the new legislation it is provided that hereafter fourth-class mail matter shall embrace all other matter, including farm and factory products, not now embraced by law in first, second or third class, not exceeding eleven pounds in weight, nor greater in size than 72 inches in length and girth combined, nor in form likely to injure a postal employee, nor of a nature perishable within a reasonable period for transportation. Special stamps, ranging from one cent to a dollar, will be used for the packages, and the rate per pound, which must be prepaid, will be determined by the zone of territory to be covered and will range from five to eleven cents for the first pound, with a corresponding decrease for additional weight. There will be eight zones, ranging from that having a mean radial distance of approximately fifty miles from the center of any given unit of area to that having a radius of more than 1,800 miles from the center of a given unit of area. Under this new arrangement the postal express will be extended to over 1,000,000 of rural delivery and star routes.

—THE BOSTON Morning Herald states that Cardinals Farley and O'Connell have sent a letter to the Archbishop of Lisbon against the stand of the Portuguese Government in separating the church and state. The Catholic leaders in America are trying to create the opinion in Europe that Americans are in favor of the Roman Church. If these foreign governments were correctly informed of the true state of American opinion concerning the separation of church and state, and that only the Catholic Church officials here are against it, they would be better able to judge of the policy of misrepresentation which the Catholics are pursuing in this matter.

—DESPITE HIS ADVANCING YEARS Thomas A. Edison spent such a busy week recently that he found time for less than twenty-two hours' sleep in the course of the six work days. By his own accounting he devoted 122 hours of the 144 to hard work. This spurt of energy was inspired by the need of finishing touches on his disk phonograph. At the end of the week he was ready to say that the invention was about perfected, and he hopes and believes that he will be able to put it on the market by October 1 or thereabout.

—FOR THE FIRST TIME IN a presidential year, the State election in Vermont has resulted in a failure to choose a governor on the popular vote, and the election is thrown into the legislature, which, however, will be strongly Republican. The vote on governor, as announced on September 4, is Fletcher (Republican) 26,200; Howe (Democrat) 20,100; Metzger (Progressive) 15,708; Fletcher's plurality, 6,100. The result was a great surprise to the Republican leaders, showing a loss of 43 per cent. in the party vote since the election of Prouty (Rep.) in 1908. The Democrats gained 27 per cent. over the party vote for governor in the last presidential year, making the best showing in twenty-five years. Their candidate, Howe, it is estimated, will run about 6,000 votes behind Fletcher when the complete returns are in. Fletcher's failure to secure a majority (although he has a plurality) encourages the Democrats to look for a big vote for Wilson in November. The Progressives regard the result as a moral victory for the new party. The disaffection from the Republican ranks did not extend far beyond the head of the ticket. In 1900, the Republican September majority for governor was 30,864, and the presidential majority the same year was 66,999; in 1904 the figures were 31,559 and 66,509, and in 1908 the vote stood 29,654 and 64,367. Political experts estimate that the slim plurality of 6,000 for Fletcher foreshadows a very close presidential vote.

—A NUMBER OF THE Korean prisoners who were forced by torture to implicate American missionaries in the alleged plot to assassinate Count Terauchi, governor general of Korea, were recently allowed to plead their own cases in court, and described in detail the tortures to which they were subjected. The Japanese lawyer acting as attorney for a number of the prisoners decried in court the severity of the present Korean régime, which he declared amounts to military rule. The crown prosecutor demanded that Baron Yunchiho and five others accused of being leaders of the conspiracy be sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, the other 117 to terms of from five to eight years.

What Is "the Kingdom"?

WHY should there be any misapprehension regarding the nature of the Kingdom of which Jesus so often spoke while on earth, and the foundation of which was his life-work? Yet it is a truth that there are very many worthy people, desirous of knowing and entering into this Kingdom, who have a wrong conception not only of what the Kingdom is, but of what is necessary to make them eligible as members of it and what it is that excludes many from it.

In all of the public teachings of Jesus, his principal and ultimate theme was the Kingdom. It was to be not only the "reign of love in the human heart," but a realization of our fealty and allegiance to God the Father, and a generous and affectionate, tolerant and forbearing consideration for our fellow-man. It was to be the desire for righteousness rekindled within us, taking the place of selfishness and worldliness. It was the regeneration of the man—his uplift from a fallen to a redeemed state, from being the slave of sin to being the freedman and adopted son of the Highest. It was that moral and spiritual transformation which changes a sullen, selfish, brutal nature, indifferent to the woes and hardships of others, to a nature filled with divine sympathy and overflowing with love for all humanity.

Who were to be eligible as members of this Kingdom, which, begun in this life, is to be perpetuated and completed hereafter? Not the selfish nor the worldling, the oppressors of the poor, the worshipers of wealth, the enslavers of men and women, the doers of wickedness. Only the miracle of complete moral and spiritual transformation could cleanse them and make them worthy of the Kingdom. Yet, strangely enough, the "unfortunates" were welcomed; the sick and maimed; the morally and physically disfigured; the law-breakers; those whom fortune had passed by; the publicans and sinners—in a word, those who, sick of sin, or flung of adversity, had looked in vain to the world for succor. Thus, the Kingdom was to a very large extent to be a social reformation. Then there were still others, countless millions, who had been earnestly praying and looking forward all their lives in expectation of the Kingdom and whom it was not difficult to persuade to enter; unselfish men and women of noble impulses, open-handed and with hearts filled with compassion and helpfulness, who saw in Jesus the great Exemplar, the Ideal of all their hopes, the fulfilment of the promise. These were welcomed into the Kingdom.

We have seen how the Kingdom was prominent in the thought of Jesus. When we pray, "Thy Kingdom come," we not only express the desire—which ought to be present in every believing heart—that Christ himself might soon return to establish his visible Kingdom here on earth and rule in person, but that the Kingdom might take root and grow in our own souls and lives and in those of others meanwhile. "The Kingdom of God is within you." When we give entrance to the King, submit our lives to be ruled by him, and do whatever lies within our power to win others to the same delightful allegiance, we have already begun the life of the Kingdom.

Euthanasia

EUTHANASIA, or the means of producing an easy and painless death—a subject not unknown to the ancients—is again attracting the attention of the medical world. Recently it came to the surface in connection with the case of a young woman afflicted with hopeless paralysis, who issued from her sick-bed "an appeal from suffering humanity for some method of putting an end to her life." In her appeal she asks, "Why should not the State take the matter in its hands and end the wretchedness of such poor sufferers?" In the suggestion of any legislation which would empower the taking away of human life on individual judgment, there is serious danger. Life is a sacred thing, and to put a sudden end to the existence of a human being is to assume the very gravest responsibility, since by so doing we may incur the double peril of destroying both body and soul together, ushering the latter into eternity unrepentant and unprepared. There is always danger that such permission would be liable to frightful abuses. Medical men themselves have recognized this as an evil, and admit that it would be a return to barbarism to place the lives of the helpless and incurable at the disposal of the physician. Influences could be brought to bear upon them to deprive patients of life who stand in the way of greedy heirs, and this fact alone should suffice to prevent the legalization of euthanasia.

We have known of hopeless confirmed invalids, lingering for years between life and death, deprived of the use of their limbs, and yet who, by their beautiful Christian spirit, had become reconciled to their condition and were a blessing to those around them. The late Bella Cooke, "the saint of Second Avenue," was such a character, and there are hundreds of others whose feeble lives have been transformed into an evangel through divine grace. They have become purified through suffering. Job in his heavy affliction was tempted to long for death, but his better nature triumphed when he said, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come." Life is God's gift to man, and even the poorest life should be sacred from violation. We shudder to think of the excesses that might be practiced in the name of science and humanity were the State to authorize its deprivation by human hands on the plea of incurable invalidism. It is an unchristian, inhuman, barbarous idea and can never be seriously entertained.

Why a Catholic Census?

OUR esteemed contemporary the New York Sun, in its issue of August 31, published the following despatch from its correspondent in Milwaukee:

It developed to-day that the conference of Archbishops Messmer of Milwaukee, Ireland of St. Paul and Glennon of St. Louis was intended to discuss a recent decision of President Taft with regard to the Catholic census of the country.

The recent official census reports were criticized by Catholics as giving far too small figures for the Catholic families of the country. The protests reached the President and he has finally authorized the taking of a special census of Catholics by church dignitaries, and the archbishops were in conference with a view to studying how to make the census correct and sufficiently inclusive.

Archbishops Ireland and Glennon were here as two who had led in the agitation against the government figures.

Apart from the fact that the foregoing may be regarded as further convincing evidence of the truth of the charge that the Roman Church is in politics, it will be asked: Why is the Catholic hierarchy dissatisfied with the figures of the census? They were compiled, as we are assured, with the same scrupulous care to ascertain the status of all the religious bodies in this country, and it is somewhat significant that at this late date their accuracy should be questioned by the Catholics alone. Why should there be so much solicit about taking a "special census" of Catholics, advance of a presidential election? President T has stated that he has treated all religious deno nations with equal fairness. Assuming this to the case, and that the census figures are the resu of such uniform treatment, why should he h suddenly come to the conclusion that "a spe Catholic census by church dignitaries" is n necessary? Is such a census to supersede t taken by the officials in the government service, cording to "uniformly fair methods" which census officials applied to all denominatio These are questions which will naturally be as by the American people, who are interested in strange a proceeding. According to the cens there were 12,321,746 Catholics in the Uni States, or about one-eighth of our entire popu tion. Are the rank and file of that church diss isfied with these figures, or is it only the hierarc that is agitating for this new census to be tak under their own auspices, in the hope of produci a more formidable showing and thus placing Catholic voting power in a better position to mand respect and consideration? Surely the pub is not to be blamed if it detects in this affair all earmarks of a strategic political move—anot step forward in the great Papal political campai

We shall watch with interest for developme in this strange proceeding, which is somethi startlingly novel in administrative methods, bei so far as we know, wholly without a precedent.

Grand Jury and the Churches

THE world is fairly familiar with the specta of the church scolding the courts, but a co scolding the churches is novel and startling. the Queens County (New York) grand jury, in presentment recently made to County Judge Dil rebuked the churches themselves for not taking keener interest in guarding the young people of city from delinquency and crime. After stati that many young women had gone astray "by appa ent laxity or inability of the parents or guardia to give them proper homes," and that many you men and boys had commenced a life of cri "brought about by idleness and improper ass ciates," the grand jury suggests: "The remedy these conditions is a grave subject that should ceive the attention of the authorities and the repr sentatives of various religious denominations in t borough."

Before quoting the paragraph which follows should like to recommend to the members of t grand jury that they make an investigation abo the effect of foreign missionary interest upon t vigor and success of local activities. It has be observed that the churches which are most active foreign mission projects are also the busiest home work. It is unfortunate that these gentl men could not have made their appeal for help fro the churches without discounting one of the mo noble and important of the church's spheres action:

This grand jury would suggest that if the heads of represe tatives of the various denominations were invited to attend sessions of the county court on arraignment day, they wo see for themselves what is actually going on and then, inste of paying so much attention to foreign missions, they wo better understand the maxim that "charity begins at home."

Aside from the disparaging reference to foreig missions, this official statement from earnest m engaged in performing their civic duties should accepted and acted upon. The church must be ma to feel more profoundly its practical duty in kee ing our cities morally clean and in holding t young people of its communities back from a li of sin. The home life should be cultivated and ma winsome. Religion should be made sunshiny a alluring. The churches should be places of brigh ness and good cheer. The parents and friends the young folks should take an active interest their amusements. The interest and the sense responsibility should not be limited to the membe of home or church, but should be made to inclu all the people, young and old. They should feel t friendly concern of their Christian neighbors. T churches should co-operate with the various mov ments tending to make life more clean and cheerfu such as the playground associations, kindergart associations, fresh-air activities, etc., and, as t grand jury suggests, should keep in touch with t courts, find out what is going on, and lend aid in practical way to help delinquents to a better wa and to hold back other lives from moral disaster.

Burned Gambling Implements

A NUMBER of gambling places in Philadelphia were recently raided by the officers of the law and the gamblers' tools and furniture confiscated and burned in a public place. The faro and roulette tables, wheels, cards, chips and all the paraphernalia belonging to such dens went up in smoke. There is fierce indignation against the gambling evil, especially in the big cities, where the moral damage is enormous, and the furniture and tools of such places are smashed in many instances. In Philadelphia the rage set the things in a blaze and made a public bonfire. The shocking revelations of the gambling vice in New York by the assassination of Rosenthal has intensified the public indignation now expressed everywhere. The whole gambling business when carried on "fairly," as the sports would say, is abominable enough; but the investigations in New York revealed the fact that many of the gambling machines were made to run "crooked," so that the customer had not a ghost of a chance to win. The ordinary swindle became the compound swindle. What a moral example the fire in Philadelphia was! What a rebuke to money secured by such fraud! It is well to have such fires as the one in Philadelphia, but they will do no good unless there shall be a moral revolution in the hearts of the people, a new birth in the desires of men. New wheels and tables and chips and games will take their place instantly unless the hearts of the people are purified by the fires of divine love. In the fires of these gamblers' devices in Philadelphia can be read the words of the prophet:

This is the portion of them that spoil us, and the lot of them that rob us. (Isa. 17:14)

Burning Philadelphia's Gambling Apparatus

Discovers Strange Lakes

ROY CHAPMAN ANDREWS, assistant curator of the Department of Mammalogy of the American Museum, arrived in New York City the other day after his tour around the world, with a number of rare specimens for the museum, and the story of the discovery of three singular little lakes in Korea. The native folklore mentioned the "Three Big Rivers," the Sam-he-Ung as the natives call them. Mr. Andrews took six natives and went in search of them. They passed through forests never before traversed, and so dense were the forests that for days the party could not see the sun. The explorer found the lakes on the top of a plateau. Their shores were of volcanic dust and their clear waters did not have any fish. Then the young explorer turned back into the water-shed of the Yalu River. Here he came nearly losing his life. As he undertook to appropriate the picture out of a shrine to a mountain god his native guides, stung with religious indignation, fixed a gun to kill him automatically in the act of taking the image. Paul almost lost his life by the religious wrath of heathenism, provoked by a supposed indignity to a goddess.

And when they heard these sayings, they were full of wrath, and cried out, saying, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. (Acts 19:28.)

Seeks Treasure Island

WHEN Robert Louis Stevenson wrote Treasure Island it is not likely that he thought any one would hunt for real gold in the dream of an author. It seems, however, that Frederick Smodden of Calgary, Canada, did think that the yarns of sea captains and visions of dreamers were descriptions of material fact rather than the pictures of a wild fancy. Smodden is reported to have started for Colon on board the steamship Turrialba the other day on his way to Cocos Island, 450 miles off the coast of Costa Rica, in search of the $30,000,000 he thinks is buried there. Trevan, an aged sea captain, reported that during some of the early agitations in Costa Rica the merchants of that country, to save their fortunes, went over to this island of Cocos and hid away a fabulous fortune. Smodden claims that a sister of the widow of this aged sea captain told a man, who told him, the important secret. Mr. Smodden carried along with him on the vessel a variety of picks, shovels and other instruments needed to unearth the buried treasure. Nobody but Mr. Smodden has any idea he will find the $30,000,000 sought, or that he will find a penny for his trouble. The world will laugh at the credulity of a man who would go so far on so wild a scheme of fortune-hunting. As far as the question of a temporal support is concerned, or the accumulation of a little for a rainy day, the adventurer had better stayed at his task, however humble or however poorly paid. And yet there are many persons credited with the best of judgment who are just as visionary and reckless in the search for earthly treasures as the one on his way to the Treasure Island. We do not refer to the many throughout the world who bore holes in the ground among the mining camps and get water instead of silver and gold, but to the many in every community who build air castles at terrible expense, and chase dreams of gold that are wonderfully expensive. Eight-tenths of all the search for earthly treasure is not far from being as visionary and unsuccessful as that of the supposed "Treasure Island." The wild and generally unsuccessful chase for earthly wealth should emphasize the lesson Christ taught:

Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt and where thieves do not break through nor steal. (Matt. 6:20.)

Reformed Convict Alderman Returns

WILLIAM J. BURKE, Philadelphia's reform councilman, was exposed as an ex-convict by a miserable creature who had been his companion in Charlestown prison in Massachusetts. Jimmy Foley blackmailed Burke till he had bankrupted him, and when he could get no more he threatened to expose the councilman. But Burke made an open breast of all, resigned his position in the board of aldermen, and fled the city and lived as an exile in New York City for several weeks. The people of Philadelphia sympathized with Burke, and the mayor wrote him a beautiful letter asking him not to resign; that as he had lived an upright life for so many years since leaving the prison the people would believe in his sincerity and honor. Burke's devoted wife, who had had so much to do in saving her husband to a life of ambition and success, had not known of his shady history, but she and her daughter stood by him, and he returned to them the other day. After greeting them, he went to the home of John L. Fehr, a local business man who had proposed to set him up in business again and give him another start in life. The spirit of forgiveness and confidence manifested by the mayor and citizens of Philadelphia and of the country at large is beautiful in the extreme. In these days of slander and mud-slinging it is truly refreshing to see the spirit of charity manifested toward this man Burke. It was not because he was a convict who had served out a long prison sentence that the sympathy was manifested, but because he wanted to be a better man and atone for the past, and because he was living a good life. The feeling was sympathy for him and contempt for the criminal who did not want to reform and who robbed his old comrade in stripes. This forgiveness is in imitation of Christ, who always pardons the penitent and helps him to a better life. Human forgiveness is taught by the apostle:

Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself lest thou also be tempted. (Gal. 6:1.)

Cabled "Can Cut"

THE Chinese legation in London has discarded the queue. Directly after the establishment of the new republic, the Chinese minister, his secretaries and all the attachés of the legation, with the exception of Chung Wing, had their queues cut off. Chung was agreeable to the new régime, but felt that he should first obtain his father's consent. Accordingly he wrote to his father in Peking, but the response was a flat refusal to allow what he thought to be the disgrace. After a month's delay the son wrote again, earnestly pleading for permission to follow the example of his associates. The son stated that he had been practically ostracized by his fellow Celestials, but the father was unyielding. The other day the son was surprised and overjoyed to get a cablegram with the two words, "can cut." The queue is now on its way to Peking as a souvenir to his wife. It is a fitting thing for these representatives of a newly liberated nation to discard the queue, the original badge of bondage. It is the proper thing for a nation reaching out so rapidly toward a world-wide life to have its official representatives conform in dress and manners to the customs of the peoples to which they are sent. The significant thing about the incident is the reverence the son had for his father when circumstances so sorely tried his loyalty. Reverence for parents is a part of the religion of the Chinese. The affection of Chung for his father and regard for his feelings are matched by many of our grown-up sons and daughters, and can be seen in the delicate and devoted attentions shown the aged in the church, the car, amid movements in and out of the house. There are some grown-up sons and daughters, however, who are cross, ungrateful, neglectful and mean with their fathers and mothers. They are rebuked by the Chinese representative who waited till he got the cablegram "can cut" before he gave up his queue. This reverence for parents is the commandment with a promise:

Honor thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. (Ex. 20:12.)

No Lobster Famine Likely

THE consumption of lobsters in this country has increased so amazingly within the last few years that fears have often found expression in the public press that the supply of this delicious article of food would be exhausted. The United States Government has had an eye toward such a danger and has taken steps to guard against it. The annual report of George M. Bowers, United States Fish Commissioner, indicates that there were 3,700,000,000 fish planted in our waters, 300,000,000 increase over last year, and 41,000,000 over the previous high record, and that 30,000,000 lobsters were planted. One of the leading fishermen on the Atlantic Coast, when asked about the likelihood of a lobster famine, said that no fishes that swim in the big ocean like the lobster can ever be exterminated. The prophet makes this reference to a fish famine in a certain country:

The fishes of the sea also shall be taken away. (Hos. 4:3.)

THE WORDS OF JESUS*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

First Lesson.—Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother. Mark 3: 35.

OUT of the kindness of their hearts the mother of Jesus and his brethren interrupted him in his teaching, because they thought he was overtaxing his strength. Jesus would not stop to see them, but sent the message we have just quoted. If we would have kinship with Christ we must be co-laborers with him in God's work for saving souls. The charge has been made that "one-tenth of our church members are doing all the work while the other nine-tenths do nothing."

In contrast with this consider the famous motto of John Wesley, "All at it, and always at it." In carrying out this motto, there was a certain family consisting of a father, mother and two sons, young men, whose custom it was to ask at the breakfast table each morning, "What can we do for our church to-day?" As a result they abounded in good works and were the pastor's best helpers. And Jesus seeing their good works must have said of them, "They are my kin."

Second Lesson.—"Who hath ears to hear, let him hear."

Jesus said these words after he had spoken the parable about the four kinds of ground on which the seed fell when it was sown. There was stony ground; and other that was infested with thorns; and other that was trodden down hard; and there was good ground. So he had before him four kinds of hearers. The ground was not responsible for its condition, but the hearers were. We must give an account to God for the ears with which he has endowed us. If we listen well to the teachings of his Word, we shall use them for his glory.

Mr. S—— was a chronic invalid, but worst of all, he was not a Christian. His wife was a faithful member of the church, and she frequently repeated in her husband's sick-chamber some of the interesting things she heard in the sermons. One sermon in particular she praised very highly, and her husband remarked, "I wish I could have heard it." This she repeated to her pastor, who kindly offered to come and read it to the sick man. Given the opportunity, he read it with all of the energy and impressiveness that he had given it in the church, which fact greatly pleased the invalid. Afterward the pastor came again to read another sermon highly commended by the wife, and as a result, before many weeks had passed, the sick man became an earnest Christian and his death was triumphant.

Third Lesson.—"So is the kingdom of God."

Jesus said the kingdom of God is like a growing seed, which is first planted, then a green shoot appears, and later the grain is formed, and then ripening occurs. The seed of the kingdom Jesus brought with him when he came from heaven to earth. He planted it in the hearts of his listeners as he went about on his tours of preaching and healing; the blade appeared in his first two followers, Andrew and John; the ear was forming in the appointment of the twelve apostles; the ripening was in process during the years the apostles went about with their Master, preparing to do the works which he did.

The kingdom of heaven is like the mustard seed, so small in itself, so large when it is fully grown. On the day of Pentecost, when the first sermon was preached by the apostles after Jesus had ascended to heaven, three thousand members were added to the church. And the Lord added to them day by day those that were saved (Acts 2: 41, 47). It has been estimated that the growth of the church should now be estimated at the rate of two Pentecosts a day—six thousand souls!

The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven. The baker and the housewife are familiar with the action of yeast, which is leaven. It takes only a small bit to raise many loaves of bread. A missionary landed upon an island where the people were all savages. He remained until his death. It has been said of him, "When he came there were no Christians; when he left there were no heathen."

Fourth Lesson.—Jesus said: "The good seed, these are the sons of the Kingdom, and the tares are the sons of the evil one."

Yes, and they grow together in every part of the world. The rain falls upon the evil and the good, and the same sun shines on both alike. And it seems that God not only keeps watch over his own, but over those who belong to Satan. In a field a tare never can become good wheat, but in God's kingdom many a child of the devil has become a saint. A pastor thus describes one of these "tares": "I was surprised when this distinguished lawyer and determined enemy of the Master crossed the threshold of our church; stern, unsympathetic, seemingly disgusted before the sermon began, and growingly disgusted as it went on. . . . Meantime there was to me but one man in all that crowded church. My soul went out for his soul. . . .

"Two days of desire and prayer ended in nothing more than dropping a line into the mail, recognizing his presence the past Sabbath, and expressing my pleasure. He replied, respectfully, in a note whose edges were as keen as its touch, icy. . . . He wanted to argue. Gently, but firmly, I declined, and said in my next note to him, 'You will now and hereafter be the subject of my earnest prayer, at a certain specified hour of each day, until you repent or perish, or I pass away.' . . . Suffice it to say the great opposer grounded every weapon, made clear and comprehensive confession before God, and, accepting Christ for righteousness and redemption, presented himself a new man. . . . 'Only let me sit down on the sill of the door, it is all I deserve,' said he at his admission into the church." (Rev. J. L. Withrow, D.D.)

Nazareth, the Home of Christ's Childhood and Early Manhood

Fifth Lesson.—Jesus said: "The kingdom of heaven is like treasure hidden in a field;" like a merchant having found one pearl of great price, he went and sold all that he had, and bought it; like a net cast into the sea, which when it was filled they drew up, and gathered the good into vessels, but the bad they cast away.

Strangely enough, one may possess the "treasure" and recognize it not until many years have passed. Luke Short heard a sermon when he was fifteen years of age by the distinguished John Flavel. When he was one hundred years old he was converted by recalling that sermon.

Wherever the Gospel net is cast, souls are gathered into the kingdom of God. No species is unknown to God, and all are taken, not for death, but for life evermore.

Sixth Lesson.—Jesus said: "Why are ye fearful? Have ye not faith?"

These words of rebuke were spoken to his disciples on a boat that seemed about to be swamped by the angry tempest. His saying is applicable to all who love their vision of Christ in any affliction that may come to them.

HOW WE TRUST

Just to leave in his dear hand
Little things;
All we cannot understand,
All that stings;
Just to let him take the care
Sorely pressing,
Finding all we let him bear
Changed to blessing.

FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGA

Seventh Lesson.—Jesus said: "The child is not dead, but sleepeth."

We say we die, but he says we sleep. W Christ as our resurrection, death should have hold on us. The heathen wrote "Impositus" tombs (buried because of no further use). Ch tians wrote on tombs in the catacombs, "Deposit (laid down to be raised again).

Eighth Lesson.—Jesus said: "The Spirit of the Lord is u me to preach good tidings to the poor, to release the capti to give sight to the blind, to let the oppressed go free, to claim the Gospel."

The Great Physician now is near,
The sympathizing Jesus;
He comes, the drooping heart to cheer,
Oh hear the voice of Jesus.

What a mission of compassion was his! And men turned their cold hearts away from him would have slain him even in the city where he grown up from boyhood.

Ninth Lesson.—There were words of Jesus in this les Mark 6: 14-29.

Tenth Lesson.—Jesus said: " harvest indeed is plenteous, but laborers are few."

He said this, seeing vast numbers of people he journeyed through the villages and cities Galilee who knew nothi about God's truth and great eternity beyond. A so he sent his twelve ap tles out among them, t by two, giving them pow to preach and to heal, a even to raise the dead, t the people might know th had been sent from G The human harvest field which Jesus looked in G ilee was not as large one's finger compared wi the field of the world, up which thousands of m sionaries are now at wo in companies large a small, and yet God is ca ing for more thousands. we cannot go ourselves, us give our money to p the expenses of those w can go. And let us uph them with our prayers.

Eleventh Lesson.—Jesus said: "Take my yoke upon you a learn of me; for I am meek and lowly of heart; and ye sh find rest unto your souls."

When we look at oxen working together under yoke, we are apt to think of it as an instrument torture. If they could speak to us, they would t us our mistake and say, "As we pull together, help each other; it would be more than twice hard to work alone."

O Master, let me walk with thee
In lonely paths of service free;
Tell me thy secret, help me bear
The strain of toil, the fret of care.

Help me the slow of heart to move
By some clear, winning word of love;
Teach me the wayward feet to stay
And guide them in the homeward way.

Teach me thy patience, still with thee
In closer, dearer company;
In work that keeps faith sweet and strong;
In trust that triumphs over wrong.

WASHINGTON GLADDEN.

Twelfth Lesson.—Jesus said, "Give ye them to eat."

These words he spoke to the twelve apostles wh they were proposing to send away hungry t great multitude that all day had listened to t teachings of Jesus on the plain of Bethsaida, mar of whom had been healed of blindness, lameness palsy and other diseases. Never was the compa sion of Jesus so fully measured as on that da To-day the whole world is the Valley of Blessin and the same God is caring for us all and pron ising that as long as the world remains we shall fed by his bountiful and unerring hand.

CHAPTER VIII

THE WINTER FIGHT

THE horses' hoofs thundered on the hard snow. Now the men cheered. Their blood was up. It seemed warmer.

The village was suddenly red with naked n. The Indian sleeps without clothing beneath blankets and furs, even in the coldest weather. ery brave had at least a cartridge belt and a nchester; there was some distance between the uth of the pass and the village; the galloping rses had not traversed it when a sudden, crashing tburst of sound filled the valley. This was fol- lved by a steady crackling as every rifle in the nds of five hundred braves was discharged, at st with one volley, as it were by instinct, followed a rapid storm of bullets which swept across the wy level. But the Cheyennes, only just awak- ed from sleep and not expert shots at best, did t do the execution with their hasty firing which ght have been expected, considering the closeness the range and the largeness of the target.

It was impossible to miss en- ely, however; soldiers threw their arms and fell here and ere; horses went crashing wn on the snow. But the fir- g of the Indians was as inef- tive to stop that rush as dust rown at a storm.

The next instant the troops re among the tepees, and the ttle of their carbines and the arper staccato notes of their volvers showed how quickly y got to work. But the cour- ge of the Cheyennes was gnificent. After their first rprise they rallied splendidly. e onrush of the charge was cked by the thick huddle of e Indian tents; the Cheyennes thdrew to the lower end of e village and then desper- ely, stubbornly, kept up the hting.

It was difficult to use the rses to advantage. Compton ve the order to dismount, and n led a rush directly upon e Indians. The fighting was the hand-to-hand type. The dians were naked as they had shed forth. If they lost that mp, they knew that their con- tion in the frozen mountain nge would be frightful. In- ed, they must conquer or die. d Dull Knife exposed himself cklessly, and they all fought only the northern Cheyennes, avest of all savages, braver even than the ux, always fought. Dull Knife was a vil- n, bloodthirsty, cruel, depraved, as were those he l, but no one could deny that he and his were men. bers had been left with the horses, carbines were ubbed; it was gun-butt against tomahawk and alping-knife.

The colonel had been looking eagerly everywhere his baby. Most of the women had fled to the e with their children to get out of the way of the ttle, but there had been no sign of the little white by anywhere. Suddenly from out the Indian nks a man, wearing a white buffalo robe and car- ing a child in his arms, burst into the open space tween the soldiers and the Cheyennes.

"Meagher!" exclaimed the colonel.

There had been a little temporary cessation in the mbat for a moment, while the rival fighters gath- ed themselves for a final struggle.

"Hold your fire," cried Compton to his men.

The soldiers dropped the carbines they had pre- ted at the advancing figure. But the Indians cognized at once what was up, and a storm of bul- s swept toward Meagher. He had foreseen it, d just before the volley he ran swiftly to one side ward the narrow wall of the valley, which here se sheer above the camp. He threw himself ainst the wall, thrust the child behind him, and ood defiant, Winchester and revolver in hand. e was yelling like a madman, as his barbaric Celtic rebears had done in many a battle of the past.

It was daylight now and the soldiers and Indians ke saw him plainly. With a whoop of rage the eat Cheyenne chief made for him with the others of his following. Colonel Compton started at full speed for the same objective point at the same moment, and the whole regiment followed to a man.

The Indians were naked, or very lightly clad; the soldiers were in heavy marching order and were further encumbered by great fur overcoats. The Indians had much the shorter distance to traverse, too, and they reached Meagher the more quickly.

Danny Meagher did not wait for them; his rifle cracked again and again as they came on until the magazine was empty, then his revolver spat into their faces until he hurled the heavy weapon into the brown of them. He received a half dozen wounds, but the blood of the fighting Irish had not yet been drained from his veins. Battling with the savage ferocity of the Indians himself, he leaped toward the red horde, his gun rose and fell like a flail until they grappled him, pulling him down as big gray wolves pull down a fighting buffalo. The next second the troopers were upon them.

The whole open was filled with a twisting, struggling mass. The advantage was not always with the soldiers either, in this hand-to-hand fighting,

Colonel Compton clasped her in his arms and then turned to look at Meagher but the superior weight and more desperate courage of the white race soon told.

The Indians were driven back. Dull Knife, fighting in the front, had received a dozen wounds. The Indians broke and fled, struggling down the open toward the narrows at the farther end. There was not a solitary pony for the chief even; Emmett had rounded up the herd not without some fighting, for a little section of the village with many braves had been pitched upon the other side.

The soldiers sought to follow, but encumbered as they were, they were no match in speed for the Indians, and for the moment Colonel Compton had forgotten everything but Danny Meagher and his precious burden.

Little Miss Ethel, too frightened to cry out, they found to be absolutely unhurt. She was dressed in buckskin and feathers, her little face smeared with paint, but she was alive and well. Colonel Compton clasped her in his arms and then turned to look at Meagher. He was a gory-looking spectacle, his white blanket cut and torn to rags and covered with blood. Yet he was conscious still.

"I got her," said he. "Leftenant Hadden will be along presently. Sure 'tis dyin' I am, but you'll give me back me place in the regiment, sor?"

"That I will, my brave boy," said the colonel.

"And you'll tell—Molly," faltered Danny, and then he closed his eyes and lapsed into unconsciousness.

"Major Dently," cried Compton.

"Here, sir," said the veteran surgeon, forcing his way to his superior's side.

"Look after this man; do your best."

And Dently dropped to his knees beside the unconscious soldier.

The next moment the crashing began again. The chief had taken advantage of the respite—for the men had crowded around the colonel and Meagher and had burst into a cheering at the sight of the baby—and had rallied his men in the narrow mouth of the cañon which continued the trail. From this opening, and from behind a natural intrenchment of rocks, he opened fire. The Indians were doing more. Dull Knife had not fought in Crazy Horse's school without learning something. He was not beaten yet. There were practicable trails ascending the wall to the south; he detached part of his men to scale it, and from high points inaccessible to the troops in the village, poured in a dropping and disastrous fire.

"Get into line!" roared the colonel, quickly disposing his baby by the side of the gallant soldier who had fought for her and the surgeon who was looking after him. "We must rush the pass."

Seconded by their officers, the troops were soon taking their positions coolly, though under a galling fire. At command they advanced, but were met by such a heavy fire from the Indians behind the rocks as for the moment checked them. The line staggered, wavered and came to a halt. Compton, Dexter, Calmore and the officers leaped to the front.

"We've got to do it!" cried the colonel. "We've got to do it! Nothing is gained as long as they are there. Forward, forward!"

"For the honor of the Fourteenth!" roared an officer.

The men took a surge forward; they bent their heads as they had bent them before the driving snow, and came on, but whether they would have succeeded in dislodging the four hundred surviving Cheyennes, over one hundred of them already having been killed, was a grave question.

The colonel, emptying his revolver toward the Indians, looked upward, half in prayer, half in hope of seeing something of Hadden. At that instant, as if in answer to his unspoken appeal, the rim of the cañon was filled with men. By a lucky chance Hadden—whom Meagher had left behind—struck the "hole" just where the farther pass ran out of it, where the Cheyennes had elected to make their stand. The exhausted men, seeing the whole course of the battle beneath them, threw themselves face down on the brink and opened fire at point-blank range into the rear and on the flank of the Cheyennes. The sound of the first shot from above quickened the troops below, and the next instant they were among the rocks firing and fighting hand-to-hand again.

Dull Knife, tomahawk in hand, sprang at Compton, who was leading. The great war chief was covered with wounds. Pealing a war cry, he lifted his hatchet; Compton was weaponless; he closed with the Indian, fell upon him with all his hundred and seventy-five pounds of bone and sinew and struck him on the side of the head a terrible blow with his fist. The chief staggered and fell, and Marnett, who was ever by the side of the colonel, made sure that he would never rise again. The rest of the Indians broke and ran, followed by devastating shots from the soldiers.

Two hundred and fifty Indians had been killed; the remainder got away, but naked and freezing in the mountains.

The battle was over. Compton was astonished to discover that he was in a profuse perspiration in spite of the cold.

EPILOGUE

IN WHICH ALL ENDS WELL

THERE is little more to add. The victory had been complete. Dull Knife had been killed and his band as an organized force had been annihilated. His women and children in the camp were in the hands

UNIQUE CRADLE-ROCKING DEVICE

UNIQUE and probably the most primitive cradle-rocking device ever seen or employed in any part of the world is the one here pictured. This novel method has been adapted by the matter-of-fact squaws of the Kwakuitl tribe of Indians now living on Vancouver Island, British Columbia. A great deal of their time when not engaged with household duties is spent in weaving, making baskets, and some parts of wearing apparel out of the fine inner bark of a certain cedar tree, a very serviceable and waterproof fabric being obtained out of this material. The picture above shows a Kwakuitl mother performing the double duty of spinning and rocking her infant, snugly packed in a hollowed-out cradle stuffed with cedar-bark strips suspended from the limb of a sapling. This is about the most realistic and accurate representation of the old nursery song, "Rock-a-by, Baby, in the Treetop," so far known; the most striking part, however, being that of the Indian mother using her big toe as the motive power. With a cord attached to the bent limb and the other end wound around her toe, she swings her dangling offspring to and fro, leaving her hands entirely free for weaving. So out of the ordinary was this scene of Indian life, which was met by an expedition, that a life-size group of this subject has just been set up in the American Museum of Natural History, New York. A BABY OF THE FRONTIER of Compton. The surviving braves, suffering incredible hardships during which many perished from cold, struggled on in the mountains and through the passes until they could join the other bodies of Indians more fortunate than they.

The camp was destroyed; every tepee was burned with all the supplies, save just enough to ration the troops and captives on their return march to Fort Sullivan. The captured women and children, numbering several hundred, were mounted on the captured ponies.

The men were allowed to rest until noon, warming themselves by the huge fires and eating their fill of the winter store of buffalo meat which Dull Knife's band had killed. Hadden's men, who had made a fearful march over the snow-covered mountains, and who looked it, were also mounted on the Indian ponies for their return. The regiment had lost thirty-five killed and they had nearly a hundred wounded, such had been the fierceness of the conflict. Two officers were among the killed and three among the wounded.

Meagher was the object of the colonel's most intense solicitude. If they could get him to the Fort, the surgeon said that he would recover. They made travois for the least dangerously wounded and litters for those more severely hurt, and with incredible love and labor they carried them down the pass. Late at night they reached the main camp.

The journey back to Fort Sullivan, terrible as it was, seemed easy compared to what they had undergone; and a week after they broke camp the column marched falteringly through the main gate and then was dismissed to the arms of its women.

A courier had gone on ahead, the indomitable Marnett whom no hardships or anxieties could daunt, and the old scout in great joy had told the young mother, whom he loved, the story of the rescue of her daughter. Marnett would not have missed the chance for anything. Mary Compton met her husband at the gate and took the baby from his arms to her heart. For the first time the colonel had to take the second place, but only for a little while. Molly, who was close behind, in obedience to the colonel's gesture went to the side of Danny Meagher's litter, bent over it sobbing and kissed him boldly before them all.

Charges against Meagher were of course dismissed. A sergeant of C troop had been among the killed, and Meagher was promoted; and when he recovered, there was such a wedding in the post as the rank and file had never seen, the colonel himself giving away the bride.

Little Ethel had many stories to tell of her captivity. The Indians had used her well, and even the great Dull Knife had condescended to notice her not unkindly. She had picked up many words and phrases during her sojourn in the tepees, and one of her favorite tricks was to strike her little breast with a gesture, in exact imitation of the Indian manner, and say:

"My fader heap big chief!"

It was an assertion that no one in the regiment had the least desire to dispute.

"THE BETTER WORLD"

The Hymn Sung at General Booth's Funeral

Music by COM'R. BOOTH-TUCKER

Moderato.
1. There is a bet-ter world, they say, O, so bright! O, so bright! O, so bright!
Where sin and woe are done a - way, O, so bright! O, so bright! O so bright!
And mu - sic fills the balm-y air And an-gels with bright wings are there,
D.S
And harps of gold and mansions fair, O, so bright! O, so bright! O, so bright!

nd wicked things and beasts of prey
Come not there!
nd ruthless death and fierce decay
Come not there!
here all are holy, all are good,
ut hearts unwashed in Jesus' blood, nd guilty sinners unrenewed,
Come not there!

And though we're sinners every one,
Jesus died!
And though our crown of peace is gone,
Jesus died!
We may be cleansed from every stain,
We may be crowned with bliss again,
And in that land of glory reign;
Jesus died!

THE UNCHANGEABLE GOSPEL

THE strange words, "Blood and Fire," which made the watchword of the Salvation Army, have been brought into special rominence in the many descriptions the scenes attendant upon the obseies of the late General Booth. hile the army was passing through s days of testing in the eyes of the orld, those words were looked upon part of its general queerness. eaders and soldiers alike were taken be more or less harmless fanatics, ho must be indulged the privilege of tting queer and rather terrifying ords on their regalia, just as they ere to be indulged in the unheard-of siness of beating drums and shakg tambourines as a means of worip and exhortation. But to-day the tuation is utterly changed. The alvation Army stands vindicated bere the eyes of a cynical world. The reatest men of earth have been glad express in earnest word and frarant wreath their high estimate of s founder and leader who has passed t of sight.

Yet the words remain as they were the days of those despised beginngs: "Blood and fire." All through e praise and display of the days hen the general's body lay in state, roughout the hours of the funeral rvice in London and the memorial services held round the world, during the long march to the grave and at the open tomb, those same strange words blazed everywhere: "Blood and fire." On the cap and the flags of the dead warrior, on cap and coat, on cape and ribbon of the mourning yet jubilant regiments who met and marched and sang to honor him; on the more than a million copies of their newspapers published in many tongues; on the stationery which carries forward the business of the great organization as it shelters the homeless, feeds the hungry, saves the erring, still the words stand: "Blood and fire." What do they mean? Have they been indeed the secret of the Army's victories? Wherein lies their magic? Words that will bring triumph such as these may well be earnestly pondered by those who are craving similar victories.

"And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me," said Jesus of Nazareth long ago. "I determined to know nothing among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified," boasted the great apostle who burst open the gates which let salvation flow from the narrow limits of Judaism out over the spiritual deserts of the Gentile world.

It would be almost humorous if it were not so bitterly tragic to observe so

MOTHER'S KITCHEN

TIMELY HELPFUL SUGGESTIONS

AT THIS season of the year more than any other, the problem of the daily menu perplexes the housewife. With the prices of meat so high, it is advisable to have desserts that are not only dainty and appetizing but which also possess actual food value.

Kingsford's Corn Starch desserts are a specially happy conception in that they are extremely tasty and pleasing and wholesome and nourishing as well.

With Kingsford's as basis, you can prepare a wide variety of tasty dishes that delight the palate and supply much needed food elements.

Kingsford's Fruit Blanc Manges are a standby with a multitude of discriminating housewives—the fruits and sauces varying with the changing seasons.

Kingsford's Corn Starch is so delicate in flavor it combines perfectly with any fruit and is served with whipped cream or a syrup made from the juice of the fruit.

These Kingsford's desserts are especially easy to prepare. The one thing the housewife has to be most careful about is the purity of the corn starch. That is all-important. Kingsford's has been standard so many years, its extreme purity is beyond question, and to avoid inferior starches it is best to insist on the old favorite.

Here is a corn starch recipe you will want to try:

Corn Starch Pudding.—Three cups scalded milk, six level tablespoons Kingsford's Corn Starch, one-quarter cup cold milk, one-third cup sugar, one-quarter teaspoon salt, two eggs, one teaspoon vanilla. Mix corn starch with cold milk. Stir the scalded milk into this mixture, return to double boiler and stir constantly till it thickens. Cook eight minutes. Beat the eggs slightly, add sugar and salt. Add corn starch mixture and cook one minute longer. Take from fire and add vanilla. Serve with cold cream and sugar. Serves six persons.

For other splendid corn starch recipes write to Kingsford's, New York, for their free cook-book.

LAUNDERING DAINTY LINGERIE WAISTS

MANY women consider dainty lingerie waists and undergarments an extravagance not because of the initial cost but because their first trip to the laundry (even the home laundry) takes away the dainty, crisp, chic freshness which was the delight of the original garment.

Too many ruined garments are blamed to the painstaking and careful laundress; it is not always true that she did not thoroughly wash the garments nor that she did not give the usual scrupulous care to the ironing—the fault, many times, is in the starch. There are many kinds of starch on the market—there is one clean, pure, package starch. Kingsford's Silver Gloss Starch, that never fails to give entire satisfaction.

Kingsford's Silver Gloss Starch is absolutely pure and free from dirt or chemical action that will spot or stain the daintiest muslin—neither will it fade the daintiest colors as do many of the cheap bulk starches.

The "colored clothes" are often the most troublesome and "fading" is very often not due to the soap or sun but a cheap starch with strong chemical reaction.

Clothes starched with Kingsford's Silver Gloss Starch iron up with a dainty finish that cannot be obtained by the use of cheap starches.

In canning season be sure to have KARO (Crystal White) at hand.

For canning of Fruit, Jelly Making, Jams and Preserves, part KARO (Crystal White) and part sugar makes the perfect syrup.

many present-day followers of Christ wearing themselves out in trying to find a new message that will win its way. "The times are new," they say. "We must find a new message." "Men's hearts and minds have changed, the church must change her message."

Not so. The message of the Cross is as potent to-day to win men from sin to holiness as it has ever been. "Christ died for the ungodly." That is the message which wins the world. "Christ died for you, my brother." That is the message which will win the heart of the twentieth century man as it won the heart of the men of the first century and of the nineteenth.

Fire? This preaching of the love of Christ that led him to die for men must be charged with the fire of God burning in the heart of the messenger. The war we are engaged in is real. Sin is real. If sin is to be overcome by the love of God in Christ Jesus, the proclaimers of that Gospel must have their hearts set on fire by the Holy Spirit. "I am come to cast fire on the earth," declared Jesus. And only where that fire burns is his work being really done. On the day of Pentecost the gift of power came so suddenly, so amazingly, that those gathered in the upper room said that the heavenly light kindled upon each countenance looked like fire. It was that fire that made the early church triumphant. It was the same fire, flaring in the soul of rugged Martin Luther, that awoke a slumbering church and purified its dire defilements. Wesley labored in vain to win men to God until an evening came on which "he felt his heart strangely warm." And the warmth thus strangely kindled in his heart has swept, in the less than two centuries since that day, into millions of other souls. Indeed, it was from that torch of Wesleyanism that the fire leaped to the breast of William Booth, just as it was the fire kindled in Luther's heart that set Wesley's soul aflame. It was the same Pentecostal fire that moved Finney and Spurgeon and Moody and Phillips Brooks to preach the evangel of Jesus with irresistible persuasiveness.

It is the only real power, this fire of God. If the church is to win modern victories in these modern times she must seek not a new message nor a new kind of power. It is the old message of the Cross that must be preached again; it is the ancient fire of God that must be kindled again in the hearts of his ministers and upon the altars of his church. Even in death the very body of General Booth drew sinners to the Mercy Seat. Death could not quench that fire which had blazed in his heart, flashed in his eye and flamed in his speech.

No need any longer to inquire as we sing to Jehovah:

> Is not thy grace as mighty now
> As when Elijah felt its power,
> When glory gleamed from Moses' brow,
> Or Job endured the trying hour?

Our very eyes have seen this man who could bear trials as Job bore them, who could lead people as Moses led them, who could prophesy as Elijah prophesied. God's power has not changed.

Shall not the regiments of Christ's universal army gather in their thought about the grave of William Booth and pray with desperate earnestness and expectant faith:

> Come, Holy Ghost, our hearts inspire:
> Let us thine influence prove;
> Source of the old prophetic fire,
> Fountain of life and love!

The Comfort of a Good Investment

Those whose money has been lost or endangered realize the bitterness of experience with investments gone wrong. Thousands of investors purchase securities which fail to pay interest or return principal. Privation and misery often result.

Consider the peace of mind and physical comfort assured by a good investment. Scrutinize your present holdings. Do they afford ample security? Is the interest return satisfactory? Are they convertible into cash on reasonable terms?

If you contemplate new investments either for yourself or for those dependent on you it is imperative for you to apply these tests and act accordingly. You have a right to 6%, good security and equitable provision for cash convertibility.

If you are an investor for income your funds can safely yield 6%. If you are earning a salary and building your own financial future out of your savings, ALL THE MORE REASON why you should get a just interest return.

The Gold Bonds of the American Real Estate Company pay 6%, and their safety is attested by an unbroken record of a quarter of a century. They are issued in these two convenient forms:

6% Coupon Bonds

In denominations of $100, $500, $1000 and upward, paying interest semi-annually by coupons, and maturing principal in ten years.

6% Accumulative Bonds

In denominations of $1000 and upward, purchasable by instalments earning 6% interest compounded annually. To accumulate $1000 or more.

and there is a sheepfold, often built of wattle and rushes, where at night the sheep are gathered, though during the day they are allowed to roam over the scanty pastures. In February every sheep has its lamb, and often a pair of them, but the lambs are kept in the fold while the mothers are feeding on the hillside.

It is an interesting sight to see the return of the mother sheep to the sheltering fold. They are eager to come, for they know that their lambs are waiting for them, and they rush pell-mell down the steep hillside to the door of the fold. Inside there may be five hundred lambs, which to the eye of a mere man look exactly alike, the same age, the same size, the same color; but the mother and the lambs make no mistakes. The shepherd, with his long staff crooked at the end, so that he may, if necessary, with it catch the sheep by the hind leg, whistles softly when folding time comes, and the sheep know his voice, and are soon safe folded for the night, each one with her own child by her side.

Another conspicuous feature that we saw from the railroad train was the little villages of houses built of mud or adobe brick, each village with its white minaret rising above the brown hovels, a tower which at least points toward the heavens and reminds the inhabitants of the one true God. Occasionally we passed a larger town with many minarets. Of these towns the most important is Ceres, a city with forty thousand inhabitants. Here Xerxes left his chariot on his famous march to the sea. But today the traveler sees little that is martial or heroic. To be sure, the Turkish soldiers, drawn up at every railway station that we passed and at every bridge and culvert, for fear of the bombs of the revolutionists or the discontented Albanians, reminded us in a remote way of Xerxes and his mighty hosts and of the other armies which have made their devastating way across Macedonia and have subdued it to the rule of Persian and Greek and Roman and Turk. At last the train drew up at the station of Drama, the nearest point to old Philippi. Here we found a large town flourishing by reason of the local traffic, and here, too, we found a Protestant Bulgarian Church (the Philippian Church, it is called), with an earnest pastor, whose wife is a helpmeet indeed in his good work, and who made us feel the moment we left the train that we were not among strangers and aliens. This family is just such an one as Paul and Silas would have sought out when they took this journey across Macedonia eighteen hundred and sixty years ago.

But we have already journeyed with the great apostle to Neapolis and Philippi, and we must return to Thessalonica and dwell for a little on the result of his message and his life in this ancient city. He lived here doubtless from December, in the year of our Lord 50, to May, 51. He first preached to the Jews, according to his usual custom, and though he made some converts among them and among the Jewish proselytes, he soon found a larger field among the Gentiles. We are especially told that a great multitude of devout Greeks believed. To this day the Greek Church is the predominant Christian church of Salonica. Though overlaid with many superstitions, a church in which doubtless Paul would find much to reprove and disapprove, yet, during all these centuries, it has maintained the Christian name, and in its creed the essentials of the Christian faith.

There are many beautiful Greek churches in the Salonica of to-day. Among them may be mentioned the Church of the Twelve Apostles. But alas! some of these ancient churches have been transformed into Turkish mosques. Among the most important and magnificent of these ancient churches which the Mohammedans have converted to their own use is one which doubtless Paul saw, and which in its architecture was originally like the Pantheon at Rome. It was at first a heathen temple, then a Christian church, and now a Mohammedan mosque, as is also the Church of St. Sophia, which was built by Justinian, and whose architect also built the magnificent St. Sophia at Constantinople. Here was once a stone pulpit, now removed to the museum at Constantinople, from which it is said St. Paul preached, a tradition about which, however, there linger the gravest doubts.

Perhaps the most magnificent of the modern mosques is the one that was formerly the Church of St. Demetrius, who, for some strange reason, became, instead of Paul, the patron saint of Thessalonica. Tradition tells us that this church was built on the site of the ancient synagogue where Paul for "three Sabbath days" reasoned with them [the Jews] out of the Scriptures.

After these three Sabbath days Paul and Silas seem to have turned to the Gentiles, and for some months, apparently, were allowed to continue their propaganda unmolested. But at last the Jews, according to their invariable custom wherever the new Gospel made headway, "took to themselves certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and set all the city in an uproar." They could not find Paul and Silas, however, in the house of Jason his host, and so they dragged Jason and some of the brethren before the rulers with the accusation that these men had turned the world upside down. This charge was as true as it was unique; far, far more true than the accusers themselves knew. Paul, through the doctrines that he was preaching, was indeed turning the world upside down, or rather, as some one has quaintly put it, he was turning it down-side up, for it was wrong, and he was righting it through his preaching, his writings and his life.

As a result of this uproar Paul and Silas were obliged to flee to Berœa, whither we shall shortly follow them. The canny magistrates, apparently taking little stock in the accusation of the rabble, took security of Jason and another of the Christian disciples to insure the city against any further turmoil which might be caused by the preaching of the apostle. He could no longer tell the Gospel story of Christ and him crucified in Salonica, but he could not remain silent. He must tell the story to another people, and so he departed by night to another city of Macedonia, some forty miles distant.

We must not suppose that during his residence in Thessalonica Paul did nothing but preach the Gospel. In fact he tells us himself in his first letter to the Thessalonians that he "labored night and day that he might not be chargeable to any of them." Doubtless he labored at his trade of tent-making, for that was and is to-day an important part of the business of this ancient city. What a contrast is presented to us, as we think of this humble artisan, toiling by day perhaps in one of the open shops of Thessalonica, and by night with the aid of his smoky lamp—to furnish him with the bare means of subsistence, that no man might have occasion to reproach him for making gain of his doctrines.

One more supreme distinction must be accorded to Thessalonica, for to this city were written two of the letters of St. Paul, which through the ages have brought strength and comfort and warning to Christians in all the world.

As we think of the apostle in Thessalonica, the city that still retains so much of its ancient greatness, we may well take into our hearts anew his exhortations to the brethren there:

"Rejoice evermore; pray without ceasing; in everything give thanks; quench not the Spirit; despise not prophesyings; prove all things, hold fast that which is good."

WHY MAN OF TO-DAY IS ONLY 50 PER CENT. EFFICIEN

By WALTER GRIFFITH

If one were to form an opinion from the number of helpful, inspiring and informing articles one sees in the public press and magazines, the purpose of which is to increase our efficiency, he must believe that the entire American Nation is striving for such an end —

And this is so.

The American Man because the race is swifter every day: competition is keener and the stronger the man the greater his capacity to win. The stronger the man the stronger his will and brain, and the greater his ability to match wits and win. The greater his confidence in himself the greater the confidence of other people in him: the keener his wit and the clearer his brain.

The American Woman because she must be competent to rear and manage the family and home, and take all the thought and responsibility from the shoulders of the man whose present-day business burdens are all that he can carry.

Now what are we doing to secure that efficiency? Much mentally, some of us much physically, but what is the trouble?

We are not really efficient more than half the time. Half the time blue and worried—all the time nervous—some of the time really incapacitated by illness.

There is a reason for this—a practical reason, one that has been known to physicians for quite a period and will be known to the entire World ere long.

That reason is that the human system does not, and will not, rid itself of all the waste which it accumulates under our present mode of living. No matter how regular we are, the food we eat and the sedentary lives we live (even though we do get some exercise) make it impossible; just as impossible as it is for the grate of a stove to rid itself of clinkers.

And the waste does to us exactly what the clinkers do to the stove; make the fire burn low and inefficiently until enough clinkers have accumulated, and then prevent its burning at all.

It has been our habit, after this waste has reduced our efficiency about 75 per cent., to drug ourselves; or after we have become 100 per cent. inefficient through illness, to still further attempt to rid ourselves of it in the same way — by drugging.

If a clock is not cleaned once in a while it clogs up and stops, the same way with an engine because of the residue which it, itself, accumulates. To clean the clock, you would not put acid on the parts, though you could probably find one that would do the work, nor to clean the engine would you force a cleaner through it that would injure its parts; yet that is the process you employ when you drug the system to rid it of waste.

You would clean your clock and engine with a harmless cleanser that Nature has provided, and you can do exactly the same for yourself as I will demonstrate before I conclude.

The reason that a physician's first step in illness is to purge the system is that no medicine can take effect nor can the system work properly while the colon (large intestine) is clogged up. If the colon were not clogged up the chances are 10 to 1 that you would not have been ill at all.

It may take some time for the clogging process to reach the stage where it produces real illness but, no matter how long it takes, while it is going on the functions are not working so as to keep us up to "concert pitch." Our livers are sluggish, we are dull and heavy—slight or severe headaches, come on—our sleep does not rest us—in short, we are about 50 per cent. efficient.

And if this condition progresses to where real illness develops, it is impossible to tell what form that illness will take, because—

The blood is constantly circulating through the colon and, taking up by absorption the poisons in the waste which it contains, it distributes them through the system and weakens it so that are subject to whatever disease is m prevalent.

The nature of the illness depends on own little weaknesses and what we are least able to resist.

These facts are all scientifically corr in every particular, and it has of surprised me that they are not m generally known and appreciated. we have to do is to consider the treatm that we have received in illness to rea fully how it developed, and the meth used to remove it.

So you see that not only is accumula waste directly and constantly pull down our efficiency by making our bl poor and our intellect dull—our spi low and our ambitions weak, but responsible through its weakening infecting processes for a list of illnes that if catalogued here would se almost unbelievable.

It is the direct and immediate cause that very expensive and dangerous c plaint—appendicitis.

If we can successfully eliminate waste all our functions work prop and in accord—there are no pois being taken up by the blood, so i pure and imparts strength to every of the body instead of weakness—th is nothing to clog up the system make us bilious, dull and nervou fearful.

With everything working in perf accord and without obstruction, brains are clear, our entire physi being is competent to respond quickly every requirement, and we are 100 cent. efficient.

Now this waste that I speak of can be thoroughly removed by drugs, even if it could the effect of these dru on the functions is very unnatural, an continued becomes a periodical necess

Note the opinions on drugging of most eminent physicians.

Prof. Alonzo Clark, M.D., of the N York College of Physicians and Surge says: "All of our curative agents poisons, and as a consequence, every d diminishes the patient's vitality."

Prof. Joseph M. Smith, M. D., of same school, says: "All medicines wh enter the circulation poison the blood the same manner as do the poisons t produce disease."

Now, the internal organism can kept as sweet and pure and clean as external and by the same natural, s method—bathing. By the proper syst warm water can be introduced so t the colon is perfectly cleansed and k pure.

There is no violence in this proces it seems to be just as normal and natu as washing one's hands.

Physicians are taking it up more wid and generally every day, and it seems though everyone should be inform thoroughly on a practice which, tho so rational and simple, is revolutionar its accomplishments.

This is a rather delicate subject write of exhaustively in the public pr but Chas. A. Tyrrell, M. D., has prepa an interesting treatise on "Why Man Today is Only 50% Efficient," wh treats the subject very exhaustively, which he will send without cost to one addressing him at 134 West Street, New York, and mentioning t they have read this article in CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Personally, I am enthusiastic Internal Bathing because I have s what it has done in illness as well a health, and I believe that every per who wishes to keep in as near a per condition as is humanly possible sh at least be informed on this subject; will also probably learn something a himself which he has never kno through reading the little book to wh I refer.—Advertisement.

In 24 Hours the Demand for This Car Was Greater Than Our Annual Supply

AND yet we are shipping better than 150 cars a day. Think of it! Nearly 1000 cars a week, and still the public refused to be satisfied. We could ship 500 cars a day and at that we could not wipe out our immediate orders. But 150 a day is the very best we can do just now. That is our present production limit. Later on when our new ctories are swung into working operation we can improve this condition; for this ason we will make 40,000 Overlands, which nearly doubles our production of e season that just closed.

We announced this car to the general public the latter part of last month. he instantaneous effect took our breath away. Inside of twenty-four hours we ard from practically every corner of the globe. It seemed to jar the entire tomobile universe. Cables from abroad were almost as thick as American egrams. Distributors, dealers and the appreciative motor buying public alike, lephoned, wired, wrote and traveled from every direction. Our headquarters in oledo were swamped with requests, demands and threats. Everybody wanted Model 69 at the same time. Nothing could curb the demand. We simply d to close our doors and ears to the riot and allot the cars as best we could.

This car took the country by storm. The very fact that a car of this size d power, a car of this magnificence, strength and comfort, a car so fully equipped ith the very best of everything, could be had for $985 was beyond all belief.

Everyone said "Why that car is identical with lots of $1,200 and $1,500 rs I have seen." And so it is.

The self-starter, big wheel base, powerful motor, rugged rear system, the unusually large brakes, the beautiful finish, rich upholstery, and the complete equipment, which includes practically everything made for an automobile, are specifications that square up with cars that cost twenty and thirty per cent more money. These specifications are all $1200 specifications.

Then there is the cold rolled pressed steel frame, the selective transmission—three speeds forward and reverse, fitted with annular bearings; the well known Remy magneto; the I section drop forged front axle which is forged in one heat and is fitted with the famous Timken bearings; the three quarter floating rear axle fitted with Hyatt bearings. This car is finished in that superb Overland blue with gray wheels, trimmed in black and nickel plate, making a most striking and stylish car of rich design. You cannot duplicate this car from any other maker for less than $1200 and some want $1500.

We have but one suggestion to make. Get your "69" order in early. Don't delay, put off or stall. Just get busy. If you want to enjoy your automobile this fall you will have to step pretty lively. "First come first served," is an old expression but it fits. The demand right now is treble the supply. We never in the wide world will be able to catch up with the orders, so if you want one of these world's record cars, act quick.

Get in touch with our dealer in your locality. If you cannot find him, wire us. There are over 2000 of them delivering these cars right and left just as fast as we can ship them. Don't you get left.

Write us for a catalogue describing this model—the car that broke all preceding automobile values. Please ask for Book K79.

Mrs. Frederick Leland, Philadelphia, Pa.

You can make new gowns by making new colors—you can brighten up and renew your wardrobe with Diamond Dyes. You can transform the colors of draperies, curtains, rugs, and carpets. Diamond Dyes are the magic workers of the home.

Diamond Dyes

There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for Wool or Silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk now come in Blue envelopes. And, as heretofore, those for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods are in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics and vegetable fibre fabrics.

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 90% Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another, and radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one classed dye while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

Diamond Dyes are sold at the uniform price of 10c per package

Boy Scouts Are in Every Country Where the English Language Is Spoken

400,000 KIND DEEDS A DAY

SINCE the Boy Scout Movement in the United States first got a start two years ago, there are 400,000 kind deeds extra each day in the world done by American boys alone. One hundred and forty-six million kind deeds a year extra! Think of that! And this is a conservative estimate. Boy Scouts tie a knot in their neckties in the morning when they start out for the day, and they are in honor bound not to untie it until they have done some one a good turn. A Boy Scout's honor is a pretty serious thing and can very well be depended upon. There is almost no reckoning the amount of good done by boys alone in this world to-day. Their motto is "Be prepared," and by way of living up to it vast numbers of boys are in training for efficiency, which will raise the standards of boyhood everywhere and vastly increase the army of self-reliant, responsible men.

Any good all-around boy, if he makes up his mind to do it, can be a pretty good "scout" whether he actually registers in any organization or not. To make boys good at reasoning and capable, law-abiding citizens is the aim and the purpose of nearly all boys' clubs, leagues and bands. There have always been "scouts," and a scout's place from time immemorial is on the danger line in times of trouble, protecting those who trust to his judgment and bravery. Wherever there have been heroes there have been "scouts." A boy cannot live up to the very high "scout" standards unless he is healthy and well, therefore he must systematically take care of himself. He must play and sleep and work and eat well.

The Commandments of a Scout

THY honor shall be kept sacred, and thy loyalty to parents and country unsullied. Be ever ready to save life. Always be a friend to animals, and never under any circumstance take money for doing a kindness or a brave deed. Be thrifty, and despise the pleasures of the street corner. Carry your back straight and your head bravely in order to grow muscular and self-reliant. Refrain from cigarette-smoking. Try to be cheerful and good-natured under all circumstances and Be Prepared.

* * *

The scouts' salute or fraternity sign is three fingers held erect; little finger and thumb joined across the palm.

Follow Him Up

A PRETTY good game for after school on autumn days is Follow Him Up. Choose a leader, and if there are enough players, the leader may choose a running mate. The rest of the players give the leaders a full five minutes' start, and then follow them up hot-foot. The leaders must chalk a trail of signs at intervals of a minute or a minute and a half. If they are caught marking the signs, or if the "trailers" catch the slightest glimpse of them, they are promptly called in and other leaders are sent out in their place. Follow Him Up is a good old barracks game.

Would You Believe It?

PLACE on the dining-room table a piece of flat thin wood about twenty by ten inches, and half an inch thick or less. Let about five inches of the piece of wood stick out over the table's edge and cover up the rest of the board with four or five newspapers. You can now deal that projecting end of the board quick downward blows with your fist or a hammer until it splinters and you cannot raise the other end of it off the table, although at a very light touch of your finger the end will fly up. Try it. This is a very old scientific demonstration of air pressure, and a very pretty trick. It is surprising how few boys and girls have tried it out.

OUR LITTLE PEOPLE'S CORNER

BUBBLE BLOWING

OUR plot is small, but sunny limes
Shut out all cares and troubles:
And there our little folk at times
Play at blowing bubbles.

The screaming swifts race to and fro;
Bees cross the ivied
paling;
Draughts lift and set the globes they blow
In freakish current sailing.

They glide, they dart, they soar, they break,
O joyous little daughter!
What lovely colored worlds they make!

A Happy Sunny Afternoon

What crystal flowers of water!

One, green and rosy,
slowly drops;
One soars and shines
a minute,
And carries to the lime-tree tops
Our home reflected in it.

Chinese to revolution. Between 3,000,000 and 5,000,000 Manchus have their assured livelihood cut off! They know no trades, for they have been soldiers. Their one imperative need is industrial education.

We cannot expect to meet the whole need, but we can help train industrial leaders. It is for this end—training industrial leaders—that the Fukien Industrial Homes is making an effort, with the help of friends in America, to secure $100,000 for an industrial plant at Pagoda Anchorage. One-half of this is needed to provide a thoroughly equipped American superintendent; the other half to purchase, equip and run the industrial plant itself. All income received will be expended to develop the plant.

This industrial plant is designed to provide industrial training primarily for the boys of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Homes, but it is hoped it will be able to receive others needing industrial education. At present a well-to-do Manchu family has donated two large Chinese houses, free of rent, toward a weaving plant in Foochow city for five years. This is superintended by a Chinese. It is approved and helped by the Chinese themselves. It is already started, but it is impossible to put it on a lasting basis without funds sufficient to purchase this unrivaled site, and to secure the services of a foreign superintendent trained in industrial methods. The Industrial Home is interdenominational, but connected with no mission. It is entirely independent, and will seek incorporation as soon as funds are secured. A site is offered, a fully trained American is considering taking up the work, and we are hoping and praying and confidently expecting that God will put it into the hearts of generous Americans to supply the means for going on with this great and sorely needed work.

The Late Major A. R. Calhoun

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has lost an honored and beloved member of its contributing editorial staff by the death of Major Alfred R. Calhoun. Early in the summer he underwent an operation, from the effects of which he failed to recover. He lingered through the summer days, bravely doing his work in spite of pain and weakness. Much of his writing was done in bed; he was never able, after his return from the hospital, to leave his home. During the last days of August his condition grew rapidly worse. To his colleagues and friends who visited him at his bedside he presented the same unflinching bravery and firm patience which had characterized his whole life. One by one he bade them "good-by," with a quiet "God bless you." The end came on Sunday, September 1, when his brave spirit entered into rest.

Major Calhoun served with the Union forces in the Civil War, and was severely wounded, suffering the loss of his right leg. Leaving the army at the close of the war, he entered upon a literary career, in which he gained distinction. He served on the staff of a number of the leading newspapers and magazines in New York, and was a favorite author of war stories and other forms of fiction, as well as a literary critic of high rank. Throughout his life he was not only brave, honorable and diligent, but tender-hearted and cordial, a faithful, affectionate friend to many who deeply mourn him. The major is survived by a widow, two daughters and one son. His death occurred in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

Mrs. A. Law (85) passed away at her old home near Savanna, Ill., where she was for over thirty years a devoted reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

David Bayless, of Toledo, O., died January 29, 1912, at the age of eighty-eight years. He was a faithful church worker since a lad, and had subscribed to this paper for twenty years.

James P. Morse (98) died recently at the home of his granddaughter in Chicago, Ill. He was for many years a devoted subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Richard Bartlett, of Guilford, N. Y., fell asleep recently at the advanced age of ninety. He was for many years deacon of the Congregational Church of his town, and a devout Christian.

F. A. Rogers, Sr., of Ovalo, Texas, passed away recently after a long life of Christian devotion. He was not only a subscriber to this paper for thirty years, but introduced it into the households of his children, grandchildren and friends.

MOTOR CARS

Made in Chalmers Shops

Send For The Chalmers Pedigree

Every man who owns, or expects to own a motor car, should send for our book, "Story of The Chalmers Car."

There is good information in it for every car buyer. It will tell you how to look for both strong points and weak points in any car you buy. It tells just how Chalmers cars are built, and why they give more service and satisfaction than any other.

It will show the man of hard common-sense just why we can build a car at $1950, that is not exceeded in strength, style, power, and durability by any other car at nearly double the price.

This is a broad statement, but true and provable. There is no mystery about it any more than there is mystery why one farmer gets 20 bushels per acre, and another gets 40. There is a reason for everything.

We want you to realize the value of these great features:

Electric lights; Turkish cushions; nickel trimmings.
Improved springs; self-starter; long stroke motor.
Demountable rims; eleven-inch upholstery.
4-forward speed transmission; speedometer.
Special silk mohair top; rain vision windshield.

A Chalmers is the car for you to buy for real service. You cannot afford to buy a cheaper car, and you cannot buy better service no matter what you pay.

Send for the book on the coupon today.

SUMMER AND AUTUMN

I

MY PRISON

THE walls are not of stone, but splendors, gold,
And blue and emerald—the soft, silken skies
That fold me in like veils of paradise.
The floors are carpeted with manifold
Colors of green and red and white, like old
Designs from lustrous looms of dead sunsets.
Inwrought are daisies, roses, violets—
Ah! fragrant beauties of a wealth untold!
The windows, stretches of a silver sea,
Opening on highways gemmed with shining stars,
Whose music glad from the high cliffs of heaven
Wings my unfettered soul upward to thee,
Before whose pure, white presence all that mars
Dies as died pain from the angel face of Stephen.

II

THE AUTUMN ANGEL

Over the melancholy earth he spreads
His dream-enchanted wings of weightless gold.
He gathers stealthily within his fold
Summer's green children, tucked within soft beds
Of fading verdure. All late blooming heads
Are hidden there beneath his shining pinions—
Dear, frayed creatures, withered, lifeless minions,
Slain by the Autumn Angel's flaming reds.
Ah me! his glance is in the atmosphere;
His voice is in the crying, crooning wind:
His yellowing kiss is fallen on every place
Our human hearts and haunts and paths hold dear:
On flower, leaf, grass, corn, vineyard, bird and mind
Of man, and pictured in his dreaming face.

Doctor Recommends Postum from Personal Test.

No one is better able to realize the injurious action of caffeine—the drug in coffee—on the heart, than the doctor. Tea is just as harmful as coffee because it, too, contains the drug caffeine.

When the doctor himself has been relieved by simply leaving off coffee and using Postum, he can refer with full conviction to his own case.

A Mo. physician prescribes Postum for many of his patients because he was benefited by it. He says:

"I wish to add my testimony in regard to that excellent preparation—Postum. I have had functional or nervous heart trouble for over 15 years, and a part of the time was unable to attend to my business.

"I was a moderate user of coffee and did not think drinking it hurt me. But on stopping it and using Postum instead, my heart has got all right, and I ascribe it to the change from coffee to Postum.

"I am prescribing it now in cases of sickness, especially when coffee does not agree, or affects the heart, nerves or stomach.

"When made right it has a much better flavour than coffee, and is a vital sustainer of the system. I shall continue to recommend it to our people, and I have my own case to refer to." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville." in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

THE POWER OF MUSIC

BY PROF. HARLAN L. FEEMAN

Westminster Theological Seminary

THE world could get along without flowers, but it would be much less beautiful. The forests could cover the hills and spread through the valleys without the birds, but they would lose their song and be lacking in much of their interest to man. The battles, the processions, the sacrifices, the feasts and the harvests of all the past might have been carried on without music, but they would have been bereft of much of their glory and influence and have come down to later generations with a far less rich association. Our churches and our homes might go on without music, but some of the keenest longings of the human soul would languish and perish, and life be much more somber than it is. If the home should no more know the fireside song and the church her evening hymn, much joy and fellowship would be missing in this life. A song has changed many a cabin into the vestibule of paradise. The faith of more than one soul has risen on the wings of a church hymn into the eternal radiance resting above the lowering cloud of the deathbed.

More particularly as to the church, what can music do? Let us say, first, that if it be of the right kind, music can create an atmosphere in which the prayers and sermons of the pulpit will flourish like the cedars of Lebanon. Many a good sermon has had its edge dulled by cold and spiritless song. Many a poor sermon has been lifted on the wave of soulful singing to the place of the unforgotten. I am quite convinced that no one so fully realizes how much the effect of the work in the pulpit is due to the singing as the man in the pulpit. Yea, more than this does he know; that frequently the emotions, the spirit, the mood, the heart of the preacher as he rises to speak, has been in the keeping of those who sing. A cold, spiritless, unworshipful song; a solo more pagan than Christian from a fervorless soul, always puts upon the preacher the burden of throwing off from himself and his hearers a depression which has settled down. If the people who lead in the music of our churches more carefully considered the effect of their work on the man in the pulpit, they would more frequently environ him with a volume of spiritual song. The ancient Hebrews believed that their kings found wisdom, and their prophets vision, under the influence of music. They had good reason to practice such belief. But more than the influence on the preacher is music's influence in the creation of an atmosphere of worship, which is worth more, perhaps, than anything else in the assembling of ourselves together. The singing may be lacking in artistic effect, the sermon not unusual, and everything in the service very ordinary, yet if there be from beginning to end a lively sense of the divine, a spirit of sincerity and reality everywhere, we have just that atmosphere which is most needed in our churches. This is not to say that cultured song is less fitted to produce such spiritual atmosphere, but rather that it is better able to produce this, provided that heart quality is united with voice quality.

What can music do? It can lift burdens from hearts that are heavy. It can sweeten the sorrows of life. It can strengthen the pulse-beat of the discouraged. It can provoke a silent intermingling of fellowship which is too deep for physical expression. It can quicken the faith of believers. Nowhere in our church life does the social confirmation of our faith take place more than in the songs of the sanctuary. There is a mysterious touching of heart with heart in this part of worship. Like the push and the pull of every particle of water which forms the wave crossing the lake, so do the waves of feeling made up of the emotions of a worshiping

Grains That Taste Like Nuts

Prof. Anderson's process for Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice requires a terrific heat.

The guns with the grains in them go into a furnace, where the heat is 550 degrees.

That fearful heat—continued an hour—gives a flavor much like toasted nuts.

So the grains are used in candy making—used to garnish ice cream—used in frosting cake.

And when served with cream or served in milk, they have that enticing almond taste.

Crisp, Airy Wafers Puffed by Steam Explosion

These curious grains, with a myriad cells, are due to a steam explosion.

The inner moisture is turned to steam. When that steam is exploded, all the millions of granules are literally blasted to pieces.

Thus the grains are puffed to eight times normal size. And thus they are made fully twice as digestible as grains were ever made before.

Thus the grains are made airy and porous, thin and melting, brown and crisp.

No Other Cereals So Enjoyed as These

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are being served for a million meals a day.

For breakfast with cream and sugar, or mixed with fruit. For luncheons and suppers in bowls of milk. As crisps in soup for dinner, and as garnish for ice cream.

No other ready-cooked cereal was ever created which people liked so well.

And never was whole grain made wholly digestible, as it is in these foods shot from guns.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

These are the premier grain foods, approved by every expert, enjoyed by every taste. There is nothing else like them—nothing to take their place. Don't let the children miss them.

TO THE BOYS OF OUR COUNTRY

COME, boys, take the floor, stand up manly and true,
And let the world see what you're going to do.
It seldom will notice just how you are dressed,
If it sees you are clean it excuses the rest,
But it gives careful heed to your action and talk,
And sees just the path you are going to walk.

Two roads lie before you. The one on the right
Has manhood and honor all plainly in sight;
The other leads off to the by-ways of sin,
Where all kinds of evil and trouble begin.
You would not like that, with the shame and disgrace
To sadden your heart and disfigure your face.

What are brains made for? "For use," you will say;
"For study, and storing up knowledge each day."
And what are hands made for? Your bright looks reply,
"To do what we can, and do more by and by."
Your answers are good, so keep the right track,
Onward and upward, and do not turn back.

Your mouths should be clean for a good loving kiss,
For mother and dear ones you never should miss;
So don't use tobacco, for often it leads
To the road on the left, with bad boys and bad deeds,
Which makes people think, and sigh with regret
As the step is all wrong, and will injure you yet.

Now school is dismissed—but I call you all mine
From each county and State, so wheel into line;
Stand firm in your places—brave, manly and true;
The hopes of our country are centered in you.
You are its Life Guard—so heed what I say,
And come at the roll-call of Company A.

ANNA KATHARINE WHITING.

The Power of Music

people roll over an assembly. It is contagious, it is irrepressible. It is almost overmastering.

Perhaps St. Paul was thinking of this in his exhortation to the Corinthians, "Be not drunk with wine wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit." He does not stop here as we generally do in reading it. He goes on, saying, "Speaking one to another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody with your heart to the Lord." This filling of the Spirit, this intoxication with divinity, qualifies for spiritual singing. The Spirit is brought into the same relation to Christian song that he bears to other kinds of Christian service. Undoubtedly St. Paul's "speaking one to another" comes to pass in our Christian songs by which the faith delivered to the saints is reenforced and established. It is more than likely that all of us would sing more in the Spirit if we thought more often of this mystic intercourse of souls through the medium of our Christian hymns.

What can music do? It can express for us thoughts of the soul which elude the sermon and the written page; those experiences of the heart too tenuous to be breathed out in common talk. Only by the tender breathing and rhythmic caress of music can they be lifted from the inner life. But how beautiful and sweet and heavenly they are when borne forth on the measured strains of music! The sacred lilt of the bridal chorus in the marriage ceremony, the eternal promises in the subdued strain of the funeral service, more fully express the deep things of the heart than spoken address ever can. Would that all of us, our choirs, our congregations, and the minister, too, might more thoughtfully consider the ministry of music.

FREE: Four Booklets Which Have Taught Many People to Cure Themselves

One clever young university student writes from Lincoln, Nebr.:

"I have confidence in this system. It has relieved an unsightly skin and mental anemia through the valuable suggestions and hints in your four booklets. There is a mine of practical hints in them, enough to convince a skeptic, were he to stick to the rules faithfully and give it a trial.

"I have already gained more brain and nerve force—more efficiency without enforced exercise.

"Your little books eliminated chronic catarrh from my system in about three weeks. To put it weakly, I was astonished. I know now that butter, eggs and rich cream caused the trouble. I thank you for your knowledge, and hope to learn more of your system in the future."

Different Classes of Foods Cause Different Diseases

I have produced in myself at will from time to time such complaints as rheumatism, catarrh, fevers, kidney trouble, blackheads, sores, dandruff, etc., by eating different classes of foods to excess, proving that the waste from each class of foods produces an entirely different disease. For instance, eggs, cream, butter, cheese, milk and salt are mucus-making foods which produce catarrh. Starch and eggs (paste-making foods) in wrong combinations congest and produce headache, dullness, brain fag, etc., while lean meats, green vegetables and fresh, juicy fruits do not.

G. H. BRINKLER, Food Expert

A thin man, after being out of work nearly a year through weakness, was restored in three weeks to hard work as a carpenter at full pay. In such cases the change from a clogging, death-producing diet to energizing foods caused a literal transformation.

Another patient, deaf in the right ear, owing to a discharge caused by an excess of mucus-making foods (cream, butter, cheese, etc.), was completely cured of deafness and catarrh by taking correct combinations of suitable foods.

A case of kidney and bladder trouble of ten years' standing was saved from a surgical operation, and the objectionable discharge cured within ten days, because the loss of control was due entirely to the constant irritation from certain irritating foods and drinks.

Correct Combinations of Foods Cure Diseases

I have always cured the above-named symptoms in a few days or weeks by returning to a correctly combined diet. The experiments have been fascinating, and the results underlie success in life.

Brainy Diet

A chronic sufferer, weighing 415 pounds, unable to exercise, took correct combinations of ordinary daily foods and reduced over 150 pounds (in public life, under many witnesses) gained strength with firmer flesh, and lost rheumatism.

People Write:

"My brain power and general efficiency have been about doubled this year by selecting brainy foods. I have made a fortune in real estate, and the credit is honestly yours."

"The government should investigate and teach the Brainy Diet System for the good of the nation."

"The hints in Booklet No. III, on foods for curing congested liver, nourishing the brain, etc., are worth untold dollars, although the books are free."

"It's Welch's"

It is both food and drink

WELCH'S is more than just a drink. It is the true juice of the ripest, finest Concords grown. That is what makes it such a delightful beverage. Our policy of paying a bonus for the choicest Concords, and our method of pressing the grapes when they are freshly gathered, brings Welch's Grape Juice to you always fresh—always delightful with the aroma of the full-ripe grape.

Welch's
The National Drink
Grape Juice

Welch's is not a manufactured drink—it contains nothing but the properties supplied by Nature. We add no sugar. It is fruit nutrition in fluid form. It is good for and relished by well people, invalids and children.

Welch's is a staple convenience in the home. It is served plain or in many tempting forms as a beverage and is used in the making of sherbets, punches and a large number of dainty desserts and delicious drinks for all occasions.

Three Famous Welch Recipes

Welch Fruit Salad

Cut one pineapple, three oranges, three bananas and six peaches in moderately thick slices and cover with powdered sugar. Over the fruit, alternately placed and nicely arranged in a dish, pour one pint of WELCH'S.

Welch Grape Punch

Take the juice of three lemons and of one orange, one pint of WELCH'S, one quart of water and one cup of sugar. Add sliced fruits, if desired, and serve very cold. This is a splendid punch and deservedly popular.

Welch Grape Sherbet

One and one-half pints WELCH'S, one quart water, one and one-half pounds sugar, juice of three lemons. Freeze this mixture medium stiff. Take the whites of two eggs and two tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar, beat thoroughly; then stir the froth into the sherbet. Freeze as hard as possible; remove the dasher and set aside for an hour or so before serving. Be careful to pack well. The best mixture for freezing is four parts of ice to one part of coarse salt.

Do more than ask for grape juice—ask for Welch's—and get it

If unable to get Welch's of your dealer, we will send a trial dozen pints for $3, express prepaid east of Omaha. Four-ounce bottle by mail, ten cents. Write now for our free booklet, "The Hostess and Welch's Grape Juice."

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

A NEAR VIEW OF GOLGOTHA, "THE SKULL"

THE OUTSIDE OF "THE GARDEN TOMB"

A VISIT TO THE GARDEN TOMB

THE one spot which, more than any other, has controlled the history of Europe lies, strangely enough, not in Europe itself, but in Asia. For the possession of the site where Christ "suffered, was buried, and rose again," more ood has been shed than for any other. An immense number of ves was laid down during the Crusades; and for six hundred ears before the Crusades, and even to the present time, a con- ant stream of pilgrims has poured into Jerusalem to worship at the spot ade sacred by the crucifixion of Christ.

From the fourth century after Christ until fifty years ago, the site was gen- rally conceded to be within the Church of the Holy Sepulcher. Now, two tes dispute the claim of being the actual Golgotha. The second claimant is nown as "Gordon's Calvary," though to an American, Dr. Harlan P. Beech of ale University, is due the actual discovery of it, General Gordon, the hero of hartoum, being first to secure for it general recognition.

"Gordon's Calvary," just without the Damascus Gate, when viewed from the ty walls, seems to stand up like some huge altar, or like a stage for the enact- g of a drama. It reaches an elevation of fifty feet, the side facing the city eing a straight, perpendicular liff, broken toward the right y a cave known as "Jeremiah's rotto," and in the center by nu- erous small caves and lines hich, in the noonday shadows, resent a striking resemblance to human skull. The top of the ill, some three acres in extent, is urmounted by a Moslem burial- round, made beautiful with reen grass and wild flowers. illions are firm in their be- ef that on this green hill our ord was crucified.

"Now in the place where he as crucified there was a gar- en; and in the garden a new epulcher, wherein was never a an yet laid. There laid they esus therefore, because of the ews' preparation day, for the epulcher was near at hand."

Within a few rods of the sum- it of "Gordon's Calvary," and enclosed by a very ancient garden, is a tomb known as the "New Tomb." A descent of some few steps below the level of the garden brings us to the door of the sepulcher. A trench runs alongside the base of the wall, and a huge round stone, clearly too heavy to be moved by feeble hands, yet remains to close the entrance. Within the tomb chamber itself is a receptacle for the dead. The marks of workmen's tools, still visible, show that the tomb was never completed.

Here, we are led to conclude, we have the hill and the tomb—the hill of the crucifixion and the tomb of the death and resurrection of our Lord. It is the one sacred spot in all Jerusalem kept and tended by English hands. The birds sing and the flowers bloom; all is open to the air and the light of heaven. Let us hope that this most holy of all places on earth may continue as it is, undesecrated.

R. J. ROBINSON.

Meager as are the references to Golgotha in the Gospels, they are sufficiently explicit. Jesus was crucified "without the gate (Heb. 13: 12); "nigh to the city" (John 19: 20); "at a place called Golgotha" (Matt. 27: 33); "on a thoroughfare leading to the country" (Mark 15: 21). "His tomb was one hewn out of the rock" (Mark 15: 46); "in a garden or orchard" (John 19: 41, 42). Among the early Christian writers, Eusebius is the first to mention that the Emperor Constantine resolved to unearth the holy tomb, which had been covered with débris, over which a heathen temple had been built. These were removed and the tomb and Golgotha revealed, and a Christian church was erected over them in A.D. 335—the site of the present Church of the Sepulcher. Later, however, other authorities disputed this site, although its authenticity was accepted for several centuries. Dr. Edward Robinson, the well-known authority on Biblical research in Palestine, was the first to seriously question the

GORDON'S CALVARY AND THE JERICHO ROAD, JUST OUTSIDE THE CITY WALLS

OCEAN GROVE'S LOVE FEAST

Mr. Tali Esen Morgan

Ocean Grove's Musical Leader

THIS season's camp-meeting, beginning on August 23 and closing September 2, was the greatest in the history of Ocean Grove—greatest in spirituality and attendance. It was truly a Mount of Vision, where one could leave the temporal things, and by faith catch a glimpse of God and his great purposes.

Bishop Wilson, as chairman of the devotional services, presided at all the meetings in the Auditorium, and he gave each morning a Bible reading at the Holiness Meeting held in the Tabernacle. This soon outgrew the building, and it was removed to the Auditorium, where hundreds listened devoutly to his teachings on "The Higher Christian Life." His theme one day was "The Unquenchable Fire"; on another, "The Victory of Faith"; on another, "The Potter and the Clay." One of his striking addresses was on "The Pillar of Cloud and the Pillar of Fire," which led the children of Israel through the wilderness. He showed it was the privilege of every Christian, willing to give himself in a surrender to God, and to accept his leading without murmuring, to be really led of God. He asked all to rise who could say from their hearts:

> I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord,
> Over mountain, or plain, or sea.
> I'll say what you want me to say, dear Lord;
> I'll be what you want me to be.

Many rose in response to the invitation and stood, with tears rolling down their cheeks.

Miss Elizabeth Smith led "The Immediate Decision" meeting at two o'clock P.M. in the Tabernacle. A daily meeting was held in the South End Pavilion at four o'clock, under the leadership of Rev. Frank L. Wilson.

The Twilight Revival Service was so crowded that it was adjourned from the Tabernacle to the Temple. Miss Helen Gertrude Rumsey was the leader of this service, assisted by Miss Emily Carrigan Porter and Miss Ruth Harris, vocalist, who sings the Gospel. This year the Berge Sisters rendered most delightful and spiritual music, singing in the Spirit. These meetings closed each evening with an altar service, when many came forward for prayer.

Dr. W. H. Morgan was called away by pastoral duty from the leadership of the Young People's meeting, and Rev. Charles Kemble, of Rahway, took his place. All the meetings were crowded, many standing who could not find seats. One day was called "Railroad Day" at the camp-meeting. About forty rugged engineers, firemen and conductors from Altoona, Pa., and other points along the line to Newark and New York were in attendance. The presence of Amanda Smith, the colored evangelist, helped to make the meeting a rousing one. There was not one dull moment, and the testimonies were most fervid. Mr. Mohn presided.

Among the well-known clergymen who preached to great audiences in the Auditorium were Dr. C. H. Babcock, the Southern evangelist; Dr. C. L. Mead, Dr. Geo. P. Eckman, Dr. Henry Ostrom, Dr. T. G. Spencer, Dr. B. C. Warren, Dr. A. H. Lucas, and Dr. Allan MacRossie.

The great annual camp-meeting Love Feast was held on Sunday morning, September 1, at nine o'clock, in the Auditorium, with Bishop Wilson in charge. He called on Dr. O'Hanlon, of Bible class fame, to lead in prayer, and Rev. Frank L. Wilson to lead the responsive reading of the Scripture lesson. The Auditorium was crowded; the body of the building and the galleries presented a sea of faces. Worshipers from England, Ireland, Bohemia, and Italy were in the audience. The sight was truly inspiring. Tali Esen Morgan led in singing, "When the Roll Is Called up Yonder I'll Be There." Amanda Smith, the colored evangelist, gave the first testimony. Then two little juveniles from Mrs. Hudson's "Juniors" brought a message on paper, "We send greeting. When the roll is called up yonder we'll be there."

Dr. O'Hanlon called on the natives of old Ireland, or their sons, or grandsons, to rise, and many sprang to their feet. A thrilling scene began when Bishop Wilson called on representatives from the West to rise and sing together:

> Jesus loves me, this I know,
> For the Bible tells me so.

The bishop then called for representatives from below Mason and Dixon's line, and a number rose and sang the same couplet. Representatives of Pennsylvania were then called for, and a host responded, joining in the song. New York was called, and many rose with shining faces to respond. New Jersey was the largest company. Then the bishop asked that all join in singing:

> Yes, Jesus loves me,
> The Bible tells me so.

The meeting increased in enthusiasm, and the people were so inspired with the Spirit that speaking and praying came spontaneously. At the close Bishop Wilson called on Dr. Ballard to offer prayer. The Love Feast was thus merged into the preaching service at 10.30 A.M. to be addressed by Bishop Wilson. At least twelve thousand people were present. Bishop Wilson asked Tali Esen Morgan, with Clarence Reynolds at the organ, to lead in singing:

> Oh, could I speak the matchless worth,
> Oh, could I sound the glories forth,
> Which in my Saviour shine,
> I'd soar and touch the heavenly strings,
> And vie with Gabriel, while he sings,
> In notes almost divine.

Dr. Ballard led in prayer. Bishop Wilson's text was Timothy 4: 8, "Godliness is profitable." He spoke particularly of godliness as "God-likeness," which can only come from entire surrender to God and supreme love to Jesus.

The bishop earnestly and directly put the question to the people, "Are you going back to live the holy life, in your family, in your business life?" He pleaded for men and women who will live the life of apostolic holiness. The sermon was listened to with great solemnity, and the people dispersed quietly with no idle talk. In the evening Rev. I. G. Wil of Philadelphia preached to another great thr in the Auditorium. He exhorted all to have spirit of Jesus in the conflict with evil. The af service was impressive and the altar was filled w seekers, some for a deeper baptism, some for pardon of their sins.

Dr. W. H. Morgan

Leader of the Young People's Meeting

"The March Around Zion" closed the camp-m ing of 1912. Before it began Bishop Wilson gav few parting words of admonition. He alluded w feeling to the beloved leaders of Ocean Grove v had fallen in the ranks, and were now in glory. "O a little while ago," said he, "Alfred Cookman h high the banner of holiness, for which Ocean Gr stands. Rev. Dr. Stokes followed him, bearing same standard. There was Bishop Fitzgera faithful and true; Bishop Simpson, our champ for holy living; and now recently Rev. Dr. Ald one of the original members of Ocean Grove As ciation. Shall we stand as they did, bearing blood-stained banner of the Cross? The conqu of the world for Jesus can only be won by Church of Christ lifting up Jesus Christ on Cross of Calvary. The preaching of the Cross w settle all the conflicts between capital and lab We are to be representatives of our Lord, and th the world will believe in him and receive him. you going home to be his representative, and st a new work in your city, your town, your villa Remember, you conquer by the Cross. It mee conflict, but it also means victory."

Then the march began. Twenty-four members the Salvation Army National Staff band, who h come to Ocean Grove to participate in a great m morial service to General Booth h on Monday evening, headed the p cession, which was led by John Patterson, chief of the Ocean Gr police. Tali Esen Morgan, with t band, led the singing of "We Marching to Zion," "When the R Is Called Up Yonder, I'll Be Ther and "Onward, Christian Soldier Following the band marched t ministers, Bishop Wilson and I Ballard leading. After the scor of ministers came the people, marc ing two by two. They marche singing, around the grounds, retu ing to the Auditorium, where joined in the old hymn:

> God be with you till we meet again.
> Keep love's banner floating o'er you,
> Smite death's threatening wave before y
> God be with you till we meet again.

After the doxology the venera Dr. Ballard pronounced the benedi tion, and with handshaking and wi grateful joy for the heavenly visio and for the strengthened purpose strive more valiantly and expe antly for the salvation of the wor the great camp-meeting of 191 came to an end.

Sparks, you recollect, used ... tell how "the oldest purely communistic societies in the United States, ... well as the most successful, are those of the Shakers. Ann Lee, a ...aking Quaker of Manchester, England, evolved a theory that Adam ...d originally created, included both sexes, but, being dissatisfied, ...s re-created and supplied with a companion, from which came ... fall. The meeting-houses of the sect then would have held ...out nine hundred people."

A Shaker "Sister" and Her Adopted Daughter

Of all their villages, Union Village soon became the largest. To visit it one ...es preferably by way of Cincinnati, a train leaving for Lebanon, the nearest ...int by rail, at 7.40 in the morning. It is a ride of thirty miles. From Lebanon ...e visitor has the choice of hiring a vehicle or awaiting the 'bus which plies ...tween Lebanon and Red Lion. Four miles, by road post, from the starting ...int, the green turrets and white tanks and orange-hued barns of Shakertown ...re to be seen among the leafless trees. Corn fields and peach orchards line ...e Red Lion road where one descends. Then there is a gray little storehouse ... the left which serves as outpost of Shakertown. This is filled to over...owing with corn and grain from the near-by fields. Only a short distance from this there is a similar frame building of a dull orange color, with windows, many-paned, as they were in the olden time. On the left looms a modern, green-painted building surmounted with a conical tower at the center and at either end. It has a portico at its front, and in general outline resembles some military institute. This is known as the office. A three-story white house above it is the dwelling-place of the settlement.

On through Shakertown the road is wide and shady. A strip of lawn and a hedge of the dwarfed arbor-vitæ separate the street from the cement pavement, and everywhere well-kept grass-plots stretch between the various barns and houses. On making a visit to the office you were admitted by a kindly sister in hood and Shaker shawl, who ushered you into the parlor, there to await the elder of the family. Moquette carpet, upright piano, tasty scarfs and well-chosen etchings, cozy chairs and tables book-laden, potted plants thriving under the mildness of steam-heated atmosphere, walls which rival the whitest snowbanks; these and other things gave the lie to the rumors that the Shakers were poor, that communism is a failure, that the effects of civilization are thwarted by the system. One could phone from here to any part of the country by aid of the instrument in the hall. Out there the floor is of marble, and carved balustrades guard the stairs that lead to the hall above. The local estate was in charge of the elders, appointed in conjunction with the Eastern ministry, whose headquarters are in the Eastern States. Two of the four trustees are always women, and the quartet deals with the temporal business of the clan. Modern machinery has caused the Shakers to close their woolen mills, and the once famous Shaker blankets, yarns and clothing are a thing of the past. The women of the community perform all the household work, no hired help being engaged inside the dwellings, and in the laundry-house there are mechanical wringers, dozens of the most modern clothes-driers, vats of soft soap, and a varied accumulation of flat-irons. The water used in the settlement is obtained from cisterns. A Shaker engineer runs the machinery about the place. A fourth-class post office, too, is in operation in the building known as the office, near which a well-stocked clothes-room is located. In the course of one's visit to Shakertown he was introduced always to Leo Goepper, a kindly old man who had been a Shaker for a quarter century, and spent an hour in his company, gathering interesting data from his talk. Something like forty-five years ago there were two hundred people in the settlement, but within the last decade it went down to between thirty and forty. The men in the community keep the place in repair and perform the grosser work. The community rises at five in the morning. Members prepare their respective rooms and assemble for breakfast at six; the men and women eating in the same room, but at separate tables. During the morning each person has his particular duties, the women caring for the sick and preparing the food. Dinner is ready at noon.

The elders enter first, the others following in point of age. At the close of the meal the assemblage kneels, then steps aside to allow the elders to pass out, after which they follow. The afternoon is spent in performing chores, reading and the like until six, or 5.30 in the winter, when supper is served. At eight o'clock the curfew rings, and while they need not necessarily retire, all good Shakers are then due in their separate chambers.

To-day, Shakertown, once the Mecca of the automobilist and the seeker of the country dinner, is deserted. The giant buildings wear a lonely aspect as they look out on the pike—the Shakers have gone, both the men and the women—and the fruit in the orchards is spoiling awaiting the picker till the new owner takes charge.

—DR. CARL DUISBERG, the eminent chemist and president of the large color works at Elberfeld, Germany, lectured recently in the Great Hall of the College of the City of New York on the strides that Germany has taken in the development of chemical industries. In the course of his speech Dr. Duisberg said: "I will refer to one of the greatest successes and yet one of the most difficult problems of the chemical industry, namely, the production of synthetic rubber. The Old World, you know, owes its knowledge of natural rubber to the New. Yes, this wonderful product became known in Europe shortly after Columbus discovered America. Therefore, if I, coming from across the ocean, now bring you this colloid prepared there synthetically, I merely repay part of the debt which we owe America." There were continued cheers, and they increased when two assistants of Dr. Duisberg rolled out before the audience two excellent specimens of rubber automobile tires, one a heavy 6½-inch tire, the other a smaller 4-inch tire. Both of the tires, Dr. Duisberg explained, had run over 4,000 miles, and yet appeared to be just as good as new, notwithstanding the fact that they had been driven on heavy automobiles. The original tread had not yet worn off, and the only evidence of wear was the seasoning of the original rubber color to a light brown.

WHEN SEVEN MEN WENT A-FISHING

A SERMON

BY

Rev. F. B. Pullan *

TEXT: "Simon Peter saith unto them, I go a fishing. They say unto him, We also come with thee." John 21: 3

OUT of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaks. The man who spoke his mind to a group of comrades, and their answer in those short sentences, revealed their state of mind and their attitude of life. It made them become representative persons. Through them has come a fine chance to get at the heart of some deep things which keep coming into the program of our human living everywhere and in every age.

We get a glimpse of the admirable quality of self-dependence amid bewildering changes. Simon Peter was the chief one of a group that suddenly, with a severe jar of spirit to all of them, had come to the end of an enterprise that had promised much, but had utterly failed, as they thought. They had given themselves and their fortunes to the task of setting up a new order of things, politically, socially, morally, religiously. It was a big proposition, but they had big hope, until their Leader's death had blocked all further progress seemingly. When their Master was crucified it made a dead halt in the march of events as Simon had planned. "Lord, this shall never be unto thee!" They had, indeed, received positive proof of his personal existence after his dying, but he was no longer the earthly head and heart of the great task of restoring political power to Israel, of setting up the kingdom of God then and there. They could think of him as a Son of God, but as a Son of David he had failed to get hold of the throne in Jerusalem. What will they now do? Jesus, who knew men, had said of Simon that he was a rocklike soul. Quick resolution would petrify into rugged strength in his character. So we hear him say, "I go a fishing." He will get to work again at his old calling. He will begin right away. He will waste no time in idle regrets. If this was his mind, it showed manfulness in going straight about something he could do, although it was so different from what he hoped to do. He and the company of those whom Jesus had called to be with him had been taken care of for several years. The company's purse had been kept full enough to supply their needs, even with a Judas for a treasurer. Jesus had been able to appeal to its sufficient fulness. "When I sent you forth, lacked ye anything? They said, Nothing." But now it is changed, and Simon stiffens up his heart, heavy with disappointment. He will take care of himself. It was not the most spiritual decision to make, nor the loftiest, neither was it the lowest and meanest thing to do. It was a self-dependent state of mind. "I go a fishing."

Influence, Our Shadow

Simon showed good sense in hard circumstances. He was a grief-stricken soul. He had done as much, gone as far, sacrificed as freely, believed as strongly as any one in the enterprise which Jesus had put up to them and called them to share in. He was hard hit by its failure. No Judas way out for him. No suicide for Simon, even though he had been caught shamefully off his guard in Pilate's palace court. He will pull himself together and do the best thing he can think of. He will go back to the work he was doing when Jesus had asked him to leave it. He will not let his sorrow utterly swamp his soul. If the milk be spilt, what use will tears be? This is not heartlessness. It is heart-helpfulness, to force oneself to some useful task, when the heart is breaking with grief. Grieving over a past failure is not the best part of any one's life. There is always a next best way, if we have failed to obtain the first that seemed desirable. "I go a fishing."

Simon Peter's decision to go back to the fishing business proved that he still had influence over other people. "We will come too." His old partners, James and John; Thomas, who had come to believe in Jesus as Lord and God; the pure-minded Nathanael, and the others, were all carried along by Simon's decision that late afternoon by the lake shore. Influence is like the shadow we cast; we cannot run away from it. We are all capable of it and all use it knowingly or unwittingly. Perhaps this incident is more notable in its human elements for the power of influence than for anything else. It shows that we cannot escape from the force of its operation either by or upon ourselves. It is false to deny it. It is guilt to neglect the right use of it. It is ennobling to employ its power in every beneficial way. Its force is incalculable. To be careless of our possibilities of influence classes us with the forces of harmful influence. Influence is a comparative quality, but not a soul is altogether forceless, and not a soul is competent to estimate the degree of influence he exerts. Penetrating to the inner essence of this mysterious power of human life, we will find that it is not so much what we do as what we are that produces the strongest outflow of influence. It is the "atmosphere" of us rather than our action which results in effective influence. As some air we breathe stimulates our bodies, while a different air depresses our bodily vitality, so is the influence of our lives upon other souls. It is possible always to invigorate the heart-life of people who come within our reach. But to have it so we must keep our souls pure and sweet and wholesome.

The Good, the Better or the Best?

Perhaps Peter intended to induce the group to go back to the fishermen habits. That would be direct influence. But quite likely it was the spiritual atmosphere of his state of heart-life at that twilight hour when courage and hope and high ideals of the life which Jesus had sought to fix upon them were all weakened and in danger of complete loss. So do we allow the spirit of our lives to become vitiated by the earthliness of our living. If we all could steadily keep in the forefront of our thoughts that we are appointed of God to saturate the range of our influence with the most invigorating and wholesome atmosphere for soul-life, we might expect vast increase of what God calls wealth. We would be soul-winners and fishers of men. We can do this only as our own souls are rugged in the faith of the love of God, which Jesus offers to every human heart. He had been training that group of seven souls in the science of such true faith. He had been enlarging their hearts and illumining their minds, and inciting their wills to choose the best way of life in this world. He had been showing them the best way as to God their Father in heaven; as to himself, whom the Father had sent to them and through them to all the world; he had been teaching them true faith as to themselves, the children of such a Father. He had started in them a faith in such a splendid reality as the kingdom of heaven being visibly dominant in all the affairs of this earthly life. He had begun to surround them with the atmosphere of that kingdom of love and good-will, and he had expected their influence would be expressive of that higher and sweeter air of the upper life whence he had come.

But, alas! Peter, who was appointed the primate apostle of this newest way of life, had that day fallen away, to be only influential in the atmosphere of an earthly occupation like the fish business. After we have said all we can of Simon's manliness, we begin to see that his enticing proposal to go back to get a living in the fish markets of Capernaum was, on his part, a consent to a great loss of the higher and nobler influence he might have exerted. Dr. Mabie says in one of his essays: "In all our relations we make our choice whether we shall evoke the best or the worst in those whom we meet." It ought to be the great business of every life worthy to be called a Christian life to give out always the contagion of faith; the influence that shall tone up all the best in other people.

Losing the Vision

"I go a fishing. We also come with thee." The story of these brief speeches shows that there are some human conditions which require God's special attention. The key to life and to every human life is in some other lock than that which shuts us up to making a livelihood as the chief end of existence. What God wanted of Simon, and the two Zebedee boys, and the twin Thomas, and the other pair of his friends, was not to become expert fishermen, not financially successful fish dealers. Those seven men had been called out from the common affairs of human living to be the apostles of another kind of success in life. The real bond which held those seven together that evening was the common consciousness which Jesus had awakened as to the heavenly and diviner significance of daily life. Constant companionship with Christ will always uplift the soul's conception of the worth of

"Lo, I Am with You"

Jesus is the authority that God's dealings with are particular and personal. We can count up his special concern for us. His only miracle af his resurrection, which was a repetition in form that one which had so impressed Simon and t two sons of Zebedee, was wrought to fasten the f

The Origin of Life

NEW poet, Alfred Noyes, has appeared in England. He is only ty-two years of age, but his work attracted much attention in liter- circles since 1902. "The Origin ife" appeared in the London Daily on September 9, and was cabled he New York Times, which gave it ultaneous publication and high est. It is a challenge to agnosti- n and materialism.

PETER GRUMP'S POTATO CROP

DROPPING his fork in the tangle of weeds and stones, Peter Grump turned to the near-by wall which bounded his field and sat down in the shade of a tree. A dreary figure, dejected, slow of movement, dull and sour of countenance, he appeared quite in keeping with the slovenly, rebellious field in which he had been digging.

From the other side of the stone wall came the sounds of voices and the frequent noise of wagon wheels. As they drew nearer, Peter Grump rose slowly and climbed to a seat on the top of the wall where he could watch his neighbor at work with two hired men and a stout boy. They were digging the late potato crop. The two men were moving steadily along the clean rows of vines, skilfully turning out the large white potatoes into the furrow and tossing the seconds into little heaps by themselves. The boy followed a few rows behind the men, gathering up the dry potatoes into bags. After him came the young farmer with the wagon to carry the bags to the barn. He stopped near Peter Grump to pick up part of his load.

"Mighty poor season fer pertaties," grunted Peter, by way of greeting.

"Nonsense, Peter, this'll be the biggest crop I ever raised." The young man straightened up and wiped the dripping perspiration from his face.

"Reckon ye hain't been round these parts long. I kin remember crops as was crops. I seen a hundred bushel raised right on this here field where I calculate on gettin' no more'n forty. I know. They hain't no more sech big crops, an' this year's the wust yet." Peter Grump shook his head gloomily, but with an air of finality.

"Call a hundred bushels a big crop?" exclaimed the young farmer. "No, I haven't been around these parts very long, only four years, but let me tell you that the first crop I raised, the year after I came, was a hundred and thirty bushels to the acre. The second crop was a hundred and sixty bushels, and this year I'll have two hundred bushels an acre if I have one. See here! Look at those rows; look at those bags, how close they stand!"

"Hump! ye can't tell me. Everybody says this is an off year fer pertaties. Drought killed 'em, an' what it didn't kill, the bugs an' the blight finished. Besides that, they were no good comin' up in the fust place. Ain't likely to have no more big crops like we used to. Them days is gone."

"Been planting potatoes in the same place right along, haven't you?" asked the young man.

"Sure, it's the best place I got."

"Well, I haven't. Last year I grew corn here, with plenty of barnyard manure. Did you put in any fertilizer this spring?"

"Nope; can't afford it; don't pay."

"All right, I did. How often did you go over the field with the cultivator?"

"Wall, I went through once, till the weeds got bigger'n the pertato vines, an' I was afraid o' pullin' 'em up."

"Don't wonder the drought caught you. I kept the ground loose on top all summer and it didn't get a chance to dry out. What kind of potatoes did you use for seed, and did you spray your vines?"

"Say, young feller, you think yer smart, don't you? Reckon I been too long farmin' to need teachin' from any young city upstart."

"All right, my friend, good day. You can go back to your forty bushels. I'm pretty busy with my two hundred. I'm young; when I'm a little older I'll be raising two hundred and fifty, and maybe three hundred bushels to the acre."

PETER GRUMP is not always a farmer. Probably you have met him in business in the city. He is always explaining his own misfortunes by the "prevailing hard times." Conditions over which he cannot be accused of having control are all wrong. "Business is dull; money is tight; nobody is buying; money that ought to come his way is being diverted into other channels of trade; election is on; his competitor is taking unfair means to steal away his customers." Anything and everything is to blame except his own wrong methods and lack of up-to-date enterprise.

He fails to cultivate new fields, and does not properly or thoroughly work the old field. He fails to plant good advertising seed. He neglects to keep the blight of carelessness from his business, and little losses that could be avoided by close attention eat up his profits; while across the way his live, up-to-date competitor increases his crop of business in the very year Peter Grump complains of as "the worst season."

One quiet summer, or early fall, it occurred to a man I knew that while everybody else seemed to be waiting for "business to open up," and complaining of the prevailing dulness, it would be a good time for him to jump out alone, with the field all to himself, and make a "clean-up." He put out a strong announcement and got a surprisingly large and profitable return before others in his line had made up their minds that it was possible to do anything at all.

CHURCH is a poor place for Peter Grump to sit down and interrupt the workers with his hard luck tales and prophecies; yet in almost every official board, or conference, or society, Peter Grump is sure to find a seat near the front ready to tell of hopeless conditions in the department of labor under discussion. When the pews are not half filled, when Sunday school or mission work lags, when current expenses fall behind, when revival efforts are unproductive, Peter Grump is quick to find the reasons in the indifference of those outside the church, or in the faults and neglect of others than himself.

Individual responsibility with individual efficiency is the imperative need in every business, and just as truly in every church. If we are ever to benefit by the "showers of blessing" of which we sing, we must have the soil in shape to receive them and drink them in. The most copious shower will run off from the surface of hard-baked ground. If we are to gather a rich harvest, we must not slight the cultivation. If we work for only forty bushels we shall find no more. If we plan and work for two hundred bushels it is unlikely that we shall be disappointed. But before we can hope for the best results we must be sure we have made the best possible personal preparation and effort. We cannot expect to reap another's planting. There is too much scattering of responsibility and of effort. We must first pray, "Revive me again," then we may safely join in singing, "Revive us again."

MY WISH

A Poem by John Quincy Adams

I WANT the voice of honest praise
To follow me behind;
And to be thought, in future days,
The friend of humankind.

That after ages, as they rise
Exulting, may proclaim,
In choral union to the skies,
Their blessings on my name.

These are the wants of mortal man;
I shall not need them long.
For life itself is but a span
And earthly bliss a song.

My great last wish, absorbing all,
Is, when beneath the sod
And summoned to my final call,
The mercy of my God.

And oh, while circles in my veins
Of life the purple stream,
And but a fragment small remains
Of nature's transient dream,

My soul, in humble hope, unscared,
Forget not thou to pray
That this thy hope may be prepared
To meet the judgment day.

[This long-forgotten poem by John Quincy Adams is sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by an old subscriber who writes: "It has been an inspiration to good works to me, and I doubt not but that the verses will delight and inspire others to a higher plane of living."]

He Careth for You

ONE Sunday morning I opened my Bible at these words: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." I am not a preacher, and I said to myself, "What is the Gospel? If I should go to my neighbors and friends, and should say to them, 'I bring to you the Gospel,' and they should say to me, 'What is the Gospel?' what could I say to them?" I knew that it was the love of God, the redeeming love of Jesus Christ; but how would one carry this Gospel to others? Later, I attended our church service, and one sentence in the sermon was the answer to my question. It was this, "The Gospel of the cross is 'He careth for you.'" If every Christian could engraft this one truth in the hearts of the people with whom he comes in contact, it would solve many hard problems. Not a day passes in which our newspapers fail to chronicle one or more suicides. Various reasons are given, but underlying it all is the failure to grasp the great Gospel truth that God careth for all, and there is always a way out of trouble and difficulty, if one will only let the Lord do better for him than he can do for himself. Though seemingly coming against a blank wall, there is a way of escape.

This is a good old world to live in, with the evidence of God's love all about us; and it is the privilege of God's children to carry the good news of the Gospel of love—the love of God for the despondent ones, whose burdens seem greater than they can bear, and to influence them to "Look up, not down; out, not in; forward, not backward," and to believe in the message of the cross, "He careth for you."

MONTESSORI'S "HOUSES OF CHILDHOOD"

IF THERE is no new thing under the sun, at least there is childhood as old and remote in its eternal newness as the days when God divided the light from the darkness and declared that it was good—childhood, around which perpetually cluster ideals, hopes, inspirations, which to the ever-present generation shine in the light of a new day. The already famous Montessori Method of training little children is in this sense new, and, because of its intrinsic merit, its well-proven excellent results and alluring possibilities, the attention of the ultra-modern educational world is largely centered upon it.

Fifteen years ago Maria Montessori, a young Italian woman of wealth, refinement and culture, brimming with life and ambition and with a broad general interest in the affairs of the world, studied for a doctor's degree at the Roman Medical Academy, and later became interested in the feeble-minded children of the public asylums in Rome. She studied their needs and their possibilities, and in the course of a few years introduced a system of teaching the tiny delinquents to read, to write and to memorize, which was so successful in its results as to make it entirely possible for the mentally and physically deficient to compete with normal children of their own age, and, in many instances, to surpass them in kindergarten and primary grades.

This astonishing result of her work convinced the young Dr. Montessori, not that the delinquents under her teaching were specially clever, but rather that the system of education of normal children could be improved.

She gladly gave up all other study, devoting herself to elaborating and enlarging her ideas, applying practically the identical principles, lessons and materials which had worked such wonders with her first pupils to large classes of normal children. Once again, the work resulted in success that was little less than phenomenal. It was brought to the attention of the school board of Rome, and, in order to give the somewhat radical theories every advantage to prove themselves, Maria Montessori was appointed supervisor of the famous Children's Houses in the poorest quarters of the Italian capital. These houses are to-day the model schools of this class in the world. Here the work was carried on and perfected with the further gratifying result that the Montessori system of instruction, adapted to the education of little children, is at present, after fifteen years' success in Rome, widely recognized as one of highest merit, and is being carried forward in other countries, as well as in Italy, with almost feverish interest. London, Paris, Berlin have each their ideal Children's Houses modeled after those in Rome, and in the short space of a year, America boasts upward of two hundred and fifty such Houses of Childhood, and in eight States the Montessori methods have been added to the kindergarten and primary curriculums of the State Normal Schools.

No adequate description can be set forth in a single article, or even in a short series of articles; but to say that the system in its present form is the result of years of practical experiment, of painstaking observation, and of scientific study among children individually and in classes, and to add, furthermore, that its purpose is to encourage the growth of strong, complete human beings physically, mentally and morally, is already to have entered far into an explanation of its most important characteristics and aims, the details of which are delightfully set forth by Dr. Maria Montessori herself in a remarkable book on the subject which has only recently been translated into English.

One of the striking aspects of the work is that it adapts to the education of normal children methods and apparatus originally designed for deficients. Another is that it represents the sincere and constructive efforts of a woman. No other such example exists.

Dr. Montessori is too liberal-minded a woman to claim either originality or infallibility for her theories, and she hopes more for the spirit than the letter of her doctrines. She expressly regards her great work in the light of experimental science and invites comparisons of likes and differences to the Froebel, Seguin and Pestalozzi methods, out of which she frankly states many of her ideas grew. Montessori and Froebel agree, for example, definitely on two points: First, the child's right to be active, to explore his environment, to develop his inner resources through creative effort, and also on the need of the careful training of the senses. Dr. Montessori, in this respect, has developed a much more concrete and elaborate method than either Froebel or Seguin, which is designed piece by piece, here a little and there a little, line upon line, precept upon precept, to develop the pupil's mental capacities by training separately his several senses.

Children Three and Four Years of Age, Practicing Some of the Montessori Exercises

A Montessori Teacher and Her Pupils at Remi

Cleanliness and good manners, self-confidence and unerring self-respect are the foundation stones of much of Madame Montessori's teachings. Children are taught to correct their own mistakes in conduct and in lessons. Teachers are allowed to administer little or no so-called discipline. The children in the Houses of Childhood discipline themselves.

"We have sometimes," says Maria Montessori, "had to do with children who disturbed the others and were deaf to our admonitions. First, we would have them specially observed by the doctor; but often they were found to be quite normal. We would then place a little table in the corner of the room and seat the child at it, with his face to the others, giving him whatever he wanted to play with. This isolation would almost always succeed in calming the child; the sight of his companions would be a most efficacious object lesson in behavior. Moreover, the isolated child would be the object of special care, as though he were ill. He himself, on entering, would first go straight to me, caressing him like an infant, and would then turn to the others and interest myself in their work, though they had been men. I do not know what happened in their souls, but certain it is that the 'conversion' of the isolated children was always definite and deep. They take pride in knowing how to work and how to behave with dignity, and for the most part they have conserved a tender affection for me, the teacher and for me."

Such methods as these, to be sure, might prove ineffectual, even dangerous in clumsy hands, but Madame Montessori is as successful in training her teachers as she has been in developing her children.

There are no desks nor benches in the Montessori model school rooms, and the children are treated as individuals (not as classes), under the subtle guidance of a carefully trained assistant, whose practical common sense has been appealed to and whose quick sympathies have been taught to turn the curb of discipline in the right direction to avoid strain or resistance on the child's part. Children are practically left alone to do pretty much as they please in attractive surroundings with plenty of opportunities and materials of absorbing interest close at hand.

The Montessori apparatus is so alluring, so varied and full of interest, that the children never tire of it and continue to handle it with ever-increasing delight.

On being asked, "How do you manage to keep your roomfuls of pupils so quiet and good?" Dr. Montessori answered, "Because they are interested. The pupils are in every case doing what they like to do."

Among the "playthings" in the Montessori outfit are substantial wooden bobbins, wound with silk in eight standard colors and eight shades of each color, making sixty-four gradations of light and shade. One of the favorite games with these bobbins is this: Eight pupils gather around a table and each is asked to select a color with which to play the game. Sixty-four bobbins are then heaped in the middle of the table and a leader is chosen to deal out the shades asked for by the players. If he makes a mistake and gives out the wrong shade, the next child on his right becomes the dealer of the bobbins, and when all the colors have been properly distributed, each child arranges his eight bobbins according to the proper gradation of shades. The one who has his scale of color correctly arranged first becomes the leader of the next game.

There are like games of comparative weights and measures. There are also blocks and bricks, tablets and rods with which to construct stairways, towers, bridges, causeways, churches and what not, that are little short of wonderful in their direct and simple adaptability to the logical development of the sense perception and awakening intelligence of the child. Substantial metal bowls filled with water of varied temperature are the delightful playthings with which tiny pupils become experts in estimating degrees of heat and cold.

On wooden frames eighteen to twenty inches square, strips of bright substantial stuffs are securely fastened, and children of three and four years learn, by means of strings and eyelet holes, to properly lace the strips together, thereby learning to lace their own shoes. Buttons and buttonholes, hooks and eyes and the tying of ribbon bows are all acquired in the same pleasant way, for the children in the Houses of Childhood must learn to dress themselves and take minute care of their persons in the making of their toilet, cleaning their teeth and finger nails, brushing their hair, and keeping dainty and attractive. They must set the tables for their luncheon also, and put the rooms in order. "It is the joyous growth along these useful lines that we so rejoice in, as we watch in these tiny tots, humanity growing in spirit according to its own deep laws and requirements," says Madame Montessori in her enthusiastic warm-hearted way; and she adds, "only he who

SOUTHAMPTON'S PILGRIM MEMORIAL

ALTHOUGH nearly three hundred years have elapsed since a memorable event happened at Southampton, England, one full of interest for the whole of civilization, it is only now that a scheme adequately to commemorate it in that city has ripened to completion. It was on August 15, 1620, that the immortal band of exiles afterward known as the Pilgrim Fathers set sail from the Hampshire town on their quest for a new home. To-day Southampton's old West Gate, through which the exiles for conscience sake passed to their ship at the "West Key," remains exactly as it was; today the Solent is still as they knew it, and there are yet standing some of the battlements of the ancient walls on which their eyes rested as the Mayflower and her unfortunate companion ship, the Speedwell, drew out into the tideway on that historic afternoon.

Here is an episode any town might be proud of, any nation remember with respect; and in recognition of this, on almost the very spot where the self-compelled Puritans embarked on their adventure of extraordinary enterprise and result, Southampton last month laid the cornerstone of a long-projected memorial to their devotion. A design for this memorial was submitted by Mr. R. Lucas, a famous English architect, and approved by the committee. On the Western Esplanade, not far from the historic West Gate, the corporation of Southampton granted a site for the monument, and on the 15th of August last Mrs. Bunce, the wife of Colonel E. Bunce, V.D., D.L., Mayor of Southampton, laid the cornerstone. The history and the memory of the Pilgrim Fathers were reviewed by Dr. Samuel G. Smith of St. Paul, Rev. James Lee of St. Louis, and Dr. Benjamin Rand of Harvard University.

There was a notable gathering of Mayflower descendants and Puritan antiquarians and historians to witness this event. After the ceremony the company passed through the West Gate and walked to the West Quay, where a number of wreaths were placed in position near to the spot from which the Pilgrim Fathers sailed. The Colonial Dames' wreath was hung in position by Mrs. Morgan Richards; that for the "Mayflower Descendants" by Miss Florence E. Taylor; from "The National Society of New England Women" by Mrs. Swalm; from "the Winslow Family" by Mrs. Du Domaine, née Miss Winslow; from "The London Hampshire Society" by Mr. Bennett; from "the Daughters of the American Revolution" by Miss Mary Paterson; from the Dominion of New Zealand by Mr. H. H. Bridges; fom "The New England Mayflower Club" by Mrs. Cooper, Southampton; and from the Dominion of Canada by Mr. Ramsey.

Visits were also made to Tudor House, King James' Palace, and a number of other points of historic interest in Southampton, whose memory dates back to the days of the Pilgrims or even further. In this connection the mayor of the city addressed the gathering, and papers of historic character by Professor F. J. C. Hearnshaw, lately of the Hartely University College, Southampton, were read and keenly appreciated by the audience.

The date of the completion of the memorial is as yet unknown, as Alderman R. S. Oakley, the treasurer of the memorial fund, announced that though the work had been undertaken and would be completed as rapidly as possible, he had not yet in hand sufficient subscriptions to be able to set the date. He was convinced, however, that the first of January next would find the memorial fund complete and the monument would be ready for unveiling early next spring.

FIRE SWEEPS A PLEASURE RESORT

ON THE afternoon of September 3, one of the most disastrous fires that have ever taken place on the Pacific Coast swept Ocean Park, Los Angeles' most popular seaside resort. The fire, which it is believed started from a defective flue, spread with such amazing rapidity that the efforts of the combined fire departments of Ocean Park and Venice, a nearby coast town, were unable to make any impression upon it. The conflagration started on what was known as Frazer's Million Dollar Pier. It leaped through the light superstructure with such rapidity that the owner of the pier and a number of pleasure-seekers who were out over the water were forced to run to the end and make their escape by jumping into boats or into the water. The beach lifeguards rescued from the water a number of those who had been forced to jump before the boats arrived to take them from the blazing pier.

From the great pier inland the fire spread until it had reduced to ruin and ashes an area of six full-sized city blocks. Practically all the amusement places were destroyed and a large part of the colony of bungalows was wiped out as if it had been of paper.

One of the principal reasons for the rapid spread of the flames was the lack of sufficient water pressure at the hydrants. Here it was found that the pressure would not drive a stream more than twenty-five or thirty feet, and the result was that the struggle against the flames was carried on, one might almost say, hand to hand.

In spite of the immense property loss, which it is estimated would be over two million and a half dollars, the people of Ocean Park are meeting the disaster with the greatest philosophy and with real enthusiasm for the new town which shall rise from the ashes of the old. A. R. Frazer, whose loss will be at least a million dollars, sat in a boat during the progress of the fire, and calmly watched a fortune go up in flames. Then the following morning he displayed across the street near his property a big painted sign which read: "Let us build a bigger and better Ocean Park." Although upward of three thousand people were rendered homeless they were almost immediately looked after by the other members of the community. The trolley company whose line connects Ocean Park with Los Angeles at once provided a strip of land where temporary dwellings and shops might be erected. Two days after the fire upwards of two thousand men were at work clearing away the débris and making ready for the builders, whose materials were even then commencing to arrive.

The Mystery of Lire

IN THESE days of rapid scientific progress and of daring speculation in "realms beyond," to which there is no human access, one is scarcely surprised to hear of new marvels in the line of scientific discovery. At a recent meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, Professor E. A. Schaefer, president of the Association, gave to the thinking world a distinct thrill by announcing that life can now be produced artificially from inanimate chemical matter. This he applies in a general sense both to the life of man and the lower animals. "The life of the whole," he said, "is the life of the individual cells only, some of which lose their vitality at the moment of so-called general death." Then, as if to admit that even science has its limitations, he added, "all that lives must die." He instanced, as an experiment, the fusion of minute drops of oil and mercury, resulting in the production of a movement precisely like that of the white corpuscles of the blood. Certain simple living organisms absorb food from surrounding objects by assimilation, and so one chemical nourishes itself on another. Again, certain chemicals in a colloidal state grow and divide like living organisms. The wonderful thing in his new discovery is a substance which he calls "hormones," "the great essential to the creation of animate life." This mysterious substance is carried by the blood to various parts of the body, exciting the cells to activity. It is "hormones," he assures us, which differentiates the sexes in all animal life. Yet it is of a very simple chemical character, and has actually been prepared in a laboratory from chemical substances.

He dismissed as of minor consequence the suggestion that life was produced by supernatural intervention, on the ground that the accepted orthodox version of the Creation was "devoid of scientific foundation." At the same time he felt constrained to admit his doubts that man "would ever succeed in creating a fully equipped being." He closed with the warning that no man should feel over-elated, as his physical achievements, his ideals and his imaginations "are all the effect of chemical actions and reactions which are due to outside stimuli and nerve cells."

Science, it would seem, can go no farther. It has once more reached the impassable barrier. It thinks it has found the clue to the mystery of creation, although it admits its impotence to utilize that knowledge. We have listened with patience to the wrangling and disputes of the scientists concerning the origin and antiquity of the human race. It is true, they differ among themselves to the extent of hundreds of thousands and even millions of years in calculating the remoteness of man's advent. Their differences are equally marked as to his ancestry. Now they challenge the Creator by this new claim. We have seen one after another of their beliefs fall to pieces; indeed, like Professor Schaefer's chemical corpuscles, they seem to have devoured each other to such an extent that it is difficult to define what science actually does believe concerning man, creation and life on this planet.

Some of the more conservative scientists who heard Professor Schaefer belittling the creation of man were most unfavorably impressed by the wildness of his assertions, and others among his auditors declared at the close that they came away "with the conviction that life had never had any origin at all." Job, the oldest of known philosophers, when he was tangled up in a wordy speculative discussion with his three comforters, gave them a rebuke which most thinking people will consider well adapted to the latest materialistic claim. "No doubt but ye are the people," said Job, "and wisdom will die with you." Professor Schaefer does not seem to have approached his subject in the spirit of reverence which was its due. He has uttered the "last word" on materialistic science. We wonder what the next word will be. This supreme problem has been foremost in all the ages, and it is not likely to be settled by this new dictum, which will probably be a nine days' wonder in scientific circles and soon forgotten.

The Emperor and the Bible

EMPEROR WILLIAM has a way of "speaking his mind" that is sometimes disconcerting to those who look for the language of diplomacy from the lips of a Kaiser. It is related that on one occasion, in conversation with Dr. Forrer, the Swiss President, the talk turned to theology, and the German ruler spoke freely of his religious convictions. "I do not care much for priests or preachers," he said. "They dilute the Gospel with too much of their own brew. As for myself, I hold to the Bible, which I constantly read. In it one finds the solution of every difficulty and every problem, even of a political description." In these days of turmoil and social and political unrest in Europe, such a testimony from so high a source to the strengthening and enlightening power of God's Word deserves to be remembered. "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path," wrote the royal Psalmist. Like monarchs of a later day, he had his troubles to face, but he knew where to go for comfort and guidance. A Bible-reading ruler gives the best assurance of a wisely governed state.

What Are You Doing for Christ?

WHY did Christ perform his miracles? What was the motive back of these wondrous acts of mercy? The ordinary answer is that he performed them to demonstrate his divine power. Another is that they were for the purpose of bringing honor to his Father. Both of these answers are true; but an answer given by Dr. Marcus Dods, in a beautiful sermon written some years before his death, strikes a human, everyday note which is tender and convincing. Jesus did these wonderful things naturally, spontaneously, because he loved the folks who were in need, and wanted to help them. He could not see a blind man without wanting to give him sight; he could not see a sick child or an afflicted man or woman without wanting to bring relief. His sympathy was so quick, so intense, that wherever he saw suffering he wanted to relieve it. Wherever he saw signs of a faith that would make a channel for his divine power to reach and remove the affliction, his sympathy and love led him to work the cure.

It is beautiful to think of all the things that Jesus is still doing for men through his church. Sad hearts are being gladdened; sinful hearts are being cleansed; darkened homes are being filled with sunshine; nations are being illuminated with the light from the Cross. The same spirit of love which moved him to mighty works during his incarnation is moving his followers now to carry on the work he began. Are we helping all we can? Have we let him touch and thrill our hearts, filling t with his tender and never-failing sympathy? the griefs of others grieve us, the sins of others tress us, the needs of others move us to helpfuln

But Christ does more than simply move us to and help others for their own sake. He has la deeper and more telling plan than that. He found a royal way to put into our poor, hu hearts the same sort of sympathy he had. He us to give our love to him, to become real friend his, to think of him, to talk and walk with He is calling disciples to-day as he called the tw in the earlier days. He cares first and most we love him, because he knows that those who him most will do the most for the others for wh he cares. He asks us to fix our love upon h then he tells us that anything we can do for s one else he counts as though done to himself. should like to have comforted and cheered served him when he was on earth. We may c fort and cheer and serve him now by doing for ers in his name what we should like to do for hi he were here in the flesh. He asks us to se every hurt child or sorrowing woman or gr stricken man, himself, the Man of Sorrows, world's great Friend. And he asks us to help t with this two-fold motive: because they repres him, and because he would help them if he hands and feet and a human tongue, as we h now.

Only one life! It will soon be past,
And only what's done for Jesus will last.

Give your best. Do your best.

Take the task he gives you gladly.
Let his work your pleasure be;
Answer quickly while he calleth:
"Here am I. Send me; send me."

The Shoals of Suffrage

THE question whether or not women shall e political life is no longer open. She has ente The men are, of course, glad the ladies have got what they wanted. But the men may also be mitted, in congratulating their sisters, to echo s dry warnings which have been heard from time time, and to repeat certain exhortations which indeed, more needed now than in the past.

Strange to say, one of the most ringing notes warning of the last months comes from a wom not a man. Edith Sellers, writing for The N teenth Century and After, a London period makes some observations upon the apparent res of woman's suffrage in Finland. She makes the heartening report that "since female suffrage c into force a fairly large section of town-dwell Finnish women have lost considerable in what might, perhaps, call 'sweet reasonableness.'" is terrible. No amount of political power co possibly compensate such a loss. But what foll is just as alarming: "Some of them go so far a hold that it better befits them, as full-blown zens, to issue railway tickets, or sort letters, tha tend babies. Babies, indeed, are rather at a count among them in this our day."

There is probably no real necessity for the los feminine charm and feminine instincts when wor take an active interest in politics. Many of th who have entered the arena are among the m winsome of America's women. But in all their litical achievements they and their sisters m take care to keep the essential characteristics womanhood, particularly the instincts of moth hood and home-making. Mrs. Frances Maule Bj man, a leading suffrage worker of Colora in a recent speech had declared most impressiv that the women of Colorado, so far from los their motherly instincts and their interest in h life, had had these impulses deepened and bro ened. She said splendidly, speaking of the conc the Colorado women feel for the welfare of c dren: "They are coming to feel that they are doing their duty as mothers till every child has b mothered. They feel that they are not doing th duty as home-makers until every household been made a home indeed."

If, along with power, American women shall k their tenderness; if, along with earnestness, th shall continue to be gentle thought and low-to speech; if, along with interest in making laws electing candidates, there shall continue to be l of home, desire for children, and painstaking car the children they may bear; if, in fine, as they t hold of the work men have been wont to do al they shall lose nothing of their real womanlin all America will rejoice that its women are gain so rapidly the privileges for which they have l and valiantly striven.

A Unique Marine Accident

ONE of the most peculiar marine accidents that has been recorded for many years took place at Balboa, Panama, shortly after midnight on August 17. The steamship Newport, which belongs to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, was lying at the wharf with cargo aboard and practically all ready to sail for South American ports on the following day. There was no greater warning than a slight creaking of the wharf, one section of it collapsed, taking down with it all the steamship moored alongside. Two of the huge cranes which were operated from a track along the outer edge of the wharf went down in the water, one falling across the forward decks of the Newport and helping to force her to the bottom. Had all were sleeping aboard the ship when the accident took place there would undoubtedly have been a considerable loss of life but for the presence of mind of an American police watchman who, on hearing the first tremble of the wharf, rushed ashore to spread the alarm. All escaped, though some had time to secure other clothing than what they happened to have on. One of the most interesting incidents in connection with this peculiar accident was the speed with which all the wreckage was gotten cleared away. Forty-eight hours after the collapsing of the wharf all the debris had been removed from the scene, the fallen cranes had been lifted back on to a solid section of the wharf, and the plans for rebuilding were already in hand and the building materials were arriving all ready for a start. It is important that the wharf to which a ship is fastened should be safe. It often happens that people entrust themselves up to those who are unworthy and unreliable. Not often the unsound ones go down and sink — not only themselves, but also those who were fastened to them. The loss of the ship without the sacrifice of a human life suggests the words of Paul in the shipwreck:

There shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship. (Acts 27:22.)

Motorcycle Murder

At a widely advertised race meet at the Vailsburg Motordrome in Newark, N. J., Sunday, September 8, there was a terrible motorcycle tragedy in which six persons were killed outright, others fatally injured, and a large number seriously injured. It was a race of record-breakers: the one between "Eddie" Hasha, the daring Texan rider, and John Albright, of Denver, Col. Hasha was going at the fabulous speed of ninety-two miles an hour, and under the eyes of his young wife in the grand stand, his wheel went wrong, and, climbing in a flash the twenty-foot incline of the track, shot through the rail right into the packed bleachers. Unchecked, unguided, it mowed the helpless crowd like a scythe. The master and other victims of the machine lay stunned upon the ground. Far down on the track, knowing nothing of the tragedy above, deaf to the screams and blind to the panic rush of the people, Albright came whirring at fearful speed. He rode in front of the bleachers just as the Hasha machine crashed against the grand stand's outer pillar and wrecked, a heap of tangled metal, back upon the track. Albright rolled down slowly, timing its movement to avenge its dead master's fate by destroying his competitor in reaching the track in front of the latter's wheel. The crash came. Albright went over his handlebars, flew through the air for thirty feet, fell at the bottom of the track unconscious, and died that night in the hospital. His wife, too, was in the grand stand. Both she and Mrs. Hasha fainted. The wildest panic ensued among the 30,000 spectators, as six dead and nineteen seriously injured lay upon the ground. It was the shocking ending of a day of Sunday sport. When will this horrid massacre of the public "meets" end? What kind of a public sentiment is it that tolerates it? What weak laws or weaker administration of them makes it possible? It was bad enough to let a man thus risk his own life, but it is worse still to imperil the lives of the many spectators. The dead at the race in Newark were victims of the craze for speed that seems to possess the nation, and victims of the craze for money that is behind most of the contests for speed. The fearful massacre at the brilliant Sunday sporting at Newark ought to be taken with becoming seriousness, and call for an end to such races and contests as defy the laws of God and man. This page has called attention to the open and notorious manner in which the Lord's Day and the civil Sabbath have been violated by the races at Newark. In the reckless destruction of human life it will be well to remember the words of Christ:

Thou shalt do no murder. (Matt. 19: 18.)

Oldest Public School Teacher

RECENTLY Dr. Zephaniah Hopper, who has devoted more time to the profession of teaching, it is said, than any other man in this country, celebrated his eighty-eighth birthday by teaching a class at the Boys' Central High School of Philadelphia, in which institution he has been a professor for fifty-five years. The venerable educator has been connected with the public schools of Philadelphia exactly seventy years. During that time what an army of boys have passed under his care and instruction out into the occupations and learned professions, into lives of honor, usefulness and happiness! How important, how divine the mission of the teacher in the school, academy, college, or university! What tongue can tell or arithmetic compute the service of the men and women who teach the children in the public schools? Neither we nor they will ever know the results of their labors till from the Last Day they look back over the harvest fields of life. The teacher has a function in the economy of Christ's kingdom.

And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers. (I. Cor. 12: 28.)

Providing for Old Age

THERE was an address made the other day before a Chicago college class by Superintendent Graves of the King Home for Old Men. Among other things he said: "Only one man in ten thousand is self-supporting at seventy. In the United States there are now 1,125,000 former wage-earners who are sixty-five years of age and more, dependent upon public and private charity at a cost of $220,000,000. Moreover, there are 300,000 old men and women in homes whose support costs $50,000,000 annually." A man beyond fifty out of a job has a hard time getting another. There are certain forms of industry that will not receive an application for service from a man over forty. In law and medicine old men have a very good opportunity, but it is ridiculous to face the fact that the minister at fifty-five is supposed to have reached the dead-line. A number of commercial and manufacturing institutions, as well as municipal departments, have provided pensions for the aged. Some of the governments of Europe have instituted pension systems for old citizens. This is most beautiful and beneficent. Many children care for their aged parents, counting it a privilege and pleasure to do so, but many old people are penniless and friendless, and one of society's first duties is to make proper provision for them and fulfil the words of prophecy expressing divine providence:

Even to your old age I am he; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you. (Isa. 46: 4.)

Flavors Growing Melons

WHILE on a visit to relatives in New Jersey recently, Professor Enoch G. Hogate, dean of the law department of the Indiana State University, described a new feature in the raising of melons. It is his claim that the fruit may be satisfactorily flavored, artificially, by the injection of some particular extract into the green stem. A hypodermic syringe is used to inject the flavoring extract. Vanilla has been used most satisfactorily. It is necessary only to take care not to send too much flavoring syrup into the green stem, as the sap takes up small quantities more readily and distributes them evenly through the heart of the melon. Whatever the scientific fact be with reference to the flavoring, it is certain that the fruit-grower has had much to do in cultivating the melon. He has not always improved it. In order that it may stand shipment in cars and ocean steamers, the watermelon has been crossed with the citron or pumpkin to give it a thicker rind, but at the expense of the ripe red heart within. If the things on branches and vines respond so readily to human culture, how much more susceptible are the hearts and lives of children and men and women to the culturing care of the Christian teacher in the home, the school and the church! Among the articles of food that the children of Israel looked back to as a luxury were the melons which they had eaten during their Egyptian captivity:

We remember the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlic. (Num. 11: 5.)

Prayer of the Arrow

THE Prayer of the Arrow" is the name of a picture twenty-four feet wide, painted by Mr. Edward Deming, which is to hang in the mission house of the Church of the Ascension in New York City. The scene is the shore of Spirit Lake, Minnesota. A medicine-man of the Sioux tribe is making a prayer to the orb of day, which is just appearing across the lake, between two great cliffs which the artist's fancy has turned into an altar. It casts a red glow over the lake and landscape and over the faces of the Indians participating in the ceremony. The whole picture is pervaded with the spirit of reverence with which the Indian regarded the works of the Great Spirit, one of whose greatest manifestations was the appearance each day of the sun. This is perhaps the first picture of a heathen rite to hang from the walls of a Christian church. It represents the Indian with the thirst for God, doing his best to find him. The medicine-man in the picture holds a bow in his hand, from which an arrow has been sent with a message to the Great Spirit. Fortunately, many Indians have found the Christ who has clearly revealed the Great Spirit, and brought him to their hearts and lives. The man with the arrow has found the Sun.

But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings. (Mal. 4: 2.)

THE HAND THAT NEVER LETS GO

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

JESUS as the Maker and the Master of the sea walked upon the waves. The apostles in a boat, already frightened by the tempest which threatened their destruction, were increasingly alarmed when they saw what seemed to be a man coming toward them, calmly ascending and descending the wave-hills of the sea. They cried out with fear, "It is a ghost!" (Matt. 14: 26.) Strange they did not think it was Jesus! But they had never before seen him walk upon the sea, only upon the land, with weary and dusty feet. Jesus came nearer and nearer to the boat, and when he was near enough for them to hear him speak, he said: "Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid." Their fears of a ghost at once subsided, and they were willing to receive him into the boat (John 6: 20, 21). But one, more daring, perhaps more loving, than the rest, proposed going out on the water to meet Jesus! "Bid me come to thee," said Peter to Jesus. And Jesus said, "Come." All of his biddings are enablings. We are told that Peter went down from the boat and walked upon the waters to come to Jesus (Matt. 14: 29). Marvelous! But we are not told how many steps he took; not many; for he soon began to sink, and regained his foothold only when Jesus took him by the hand, saying, "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" By that time they had reached the boat, and when they got in, the storm ceased (Matt. 14: 29-33).

Peter's faith was big at first, almost audacious, to think that he could walk upon the waters at all, but it was little, in that it lasted so short a time. What a hero of faith he would have been if he had walked all the way to meet Jesus, and then walked back with him to the boat, nothing wavering. But we must count him pretty much of a hero to even begin doing it. He certainly showed more faith than any of the other disciples. We venture to say that word concerning the incident was soon spread abroad in all Capernaum, and that Peter was the hero of the hour; but of course some discredited him because he had not held out. But it is always better to try and fail than not try at all. We do not read that Peter ever again had occasion to walk upon the sea, but we must believe his faith would not have failed the second time.

A log lay across a stream for a bridge, and two girls were about to cross on it; the first went over bravely and quietly; the other stepped tremblingly as the log shook, and said, "I can't go any farther." "Don't look at the log shake, but just look up and walk right along," said the girl who had already crossed over. The advice was taken, and the two soon stood side by side. That was a case of nerves, we would say. Yes; nerves that made fear, followed by nerve, which gave courage. In a recent article, Dr. Orison Swett Marden says: "Fear is one of the most deadly instruments for marring human lives. It has a paralyzing, blighting influence upon the whole being. It impoverishes the blood and destroys health by impairing the digestion, cutting off nutrition and lowering the physical and mental vitality. It crushes out hope, kills courage, and so enfeebles the mind's action that it cannot create. And fear kills initiative. Fear strangles originality, daring, boldness; it kills individuality and weakens all the mental processes. Great things are never done under a sense of fear of some impending danger. It depresses normal mental action and renders one incapable of acting wisely in an emergency, for no one can think clearly and act wisely when paralyzed by fear." He might have added, fear paralyzes faith in God, as we see in the case of Peter. A lady was telling a six-year-old boy some stories about the jungle, and she named lions, tigers, snakes. The boy interrupted her and interjected, "and microbes." He was an up-to-date boy and had been hearing the wise talk of his parents and their friends about the microbes from which come deadly diseases. We will make no mistake in classifying fear as a deadly microbe. If you have any doubt about it, re-read Dr. Marden's testimony concerning it. And the next time you feel its presence, recall the advice of the little girl who said, "Look up, and walk right along." The Christian should look up, even to Jesus, and then we shall have nothing to fear. Let us take warning from Peter, who looked at the waves instead of Jesus.

Christ and St. Peter
(From the painting by Plockhorst)

Heroism is of two sorts; one is born of physical courage, and the other of faith in God. The latter is the more enduring, because its foundations are eternal. Mere physical heroism may give way at any moment, but it is truly glorious while it last

The story of Oliver Cromwell and a girl's heroi for her lover, as told in the familiar poem, "Curfe Shall Not Ring To-night," needs no repetitio That was physical heroism incited by affectio Another phase of heroism is illustrated by one wi saved the lives of forty-one people. It was in t year 1902 in Oil Creek Valley, Pa. Incessant rair followed by a cloudburst, made of the usual sma creek an angry torrent, carrying death and destru tion in its path; men, women and children we clinging to window ledges, trees and fences, callin piteously for help. John Haladay Gordon, residi in a near-by village, heard of the distress, and ha tened in his small boat to the scene of the disast Seven times he rowed his boat through the su merged streets of the village, returning each tir with a freight of human beings whom he landed places of safety. When nearly overcome with f tigue, a terrible explosion of oil tanks occurred, a the burning oil came floating down towards hi Gordon plunged into the flood, diving down, to pr vent being roasted by the burning mass. Final the burning river passed by, and he was able escape to shore. Mr. Gordon was modest, a afterward, speaking of the work that he had pe formed, said: "I was in God's hands, his instr ment. He had a work for me to do, and I did it t best I could." That was true Christian heroism.

Not alone is the strength of manhood requir for such deeds; they may be undertaken by yout A boy, pale-faced and slender, presented himself a nurse when the yellow fever was raging. "Ha you ever had the yellow fever?" asked the phy cian. "No, sir." "Do you know anything abo the disease?" "No, sir." "Why, how can you any good as a nurse here?" "You can tell me ho and I can do as you tell me." The doctor was i pressed by the boy's determination and set him work. Hard and fearful work it was, but the b did it well. The doctor declared he had never b fore seen such an instance of patient and tend fidelity. But at length he was stricken down wi the fever. The doctor hurried to his bedside a found him lying with closed eyes and folded arm praying. "Such a prayer," said the doctor, never listened to before. His mother (who was widow), the physician and nurses, the sufferi sick, were all remembered." For himself dea had no alarm; he knew whom he had followed a in whom his soul trusted. As gently and faithful as if he had been his own son, the doctor tend him. He recovered and lived to add to his devot work.

The spirit of Christian heroism not only imp human beings to relieve the sufferings of othe but it makes them calm to bear their own trials, membering that Jesus has said: "Be of good chee it is I; be not afraid." We are out on the sea life, amid the contrary winds of temptation and t waves of sorrow, in the way of his commandmen and yet in seeming danger of destruction. B yonder on the hills of heaven Christ is watching waiting to come to us.

Behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow,
Keeping watch above his own.

Or, as Browning puts it:

God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world.

We shall be safe if we never allow ourselves get out of the sound of Jesus' words: "It is I: not afraid." He is close beside us, nearer th hands and feet, Spirit with spirit. There will no sinking unless we lose sight of him.

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for October 6, 1912. Jesus walking on the Sea. Mark 6: 45-56. GOLDEN TEXT: "Straightway Jesus spake unto them saying, Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid." Matt. 14: 27.

OUR SUNDAY-SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

[Every CHRISTIAN HERALD reader is requested to bring this new department to the attention of every Sunday school superintendent he knows, asking his co-operation in making the department helpful. If you will send us names and addresses of superintendents in your town or county or State, we will send them sample copies. The Round Table is to be devoted, not so much to theories as to successful methods of increasing Sunday school membership and attendance; getting the Sunday school pupils to become regular church attendants, and, best of all, to become Christians and church members and useful citizens. Send us some one success that has been achieved in any of these lines, expressed in one hundred words or less.]

—MRS. CRAFTS, one of the teachers of this CHRISTIAN HERALD Million Bible Class, at her husband's request, went out one Sunday morning in Yorkville, New York City, during the hour of preaching service, in order to reach the children who were not church-goers, and by distributing a colored picture paper for children, containing an invitation to come to the Sunday school, to the children who thronged about her when a few had received the paper, secured sixty new pupils in sixty minutes.

—AS THE LATEST statistics show that there are twenty-three millions under twenty years of age in the United States not connected with any Sunday school, and only thirteen millions who are, it would seem that a similar experience might be had in almost any city, and there is a great work to be done even in the countryside.

—ON THE SUBJECT of keeping up the interest we recall the favorite saying of "Billie" Witham, the Sunday school leader of Georgia, in arguing for more use of the blackboard and visible illustrations in the Sunday school. He says: "What goes in one ear goes out the other, but what goes in the eye stays, for there is no hole in the back of the head for it to get out."

—THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ought to appeal far more to the eye than it does, not only by blackboards and charts, but also by use of slates and writing pads in small classes.

—THE BEST WAY to keep a class of lively boys interested is to give not only their ears but their eyes and hands something to do all the while.

—AS TO CHURCH attendance, the teachers of this class brought four hundred out of four hundred and fifty of their New York Sunday school regularly to church by having Sunday school first and then marching it in a body into church, those whose parents had no family pew or not sufficient room marching to the galleries, where they never made the preacher the least trouble, for he always had something in the sermon for them and selected one of the hymns with special reference to them. T successor drove them all out by having noth of interest to the children, and addressing th chiefly in criticism because, being uninterest they were uneasy.

—ONE OF THE most successful methods wh the same pastor used in getting boys to the church was playing football with them his big church yard in Brooklyn on Mon afternoons—the association game in which ball is kicked and not the players, and in wh no one was ever hurt. This brought the pas in such close acquaintance with the boys t a large proportion of them were led into chu membership.

Every superintendent, pastor or teacher w has any successful report on any of th lines, whether great or small, is requested send it to Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, 206 Penn vania Avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

I had the American Costs System Company, Incorporated—the best in the country—send their leading expert here. Mr. Fleming has opened our eyes. For instance, your work and that of two other men will be so systematized as to be done by one man—and I'm sorry, but it must be done by the youngest."

It is only the aged and hopeless that realize in its uttermost irony the insolence of that ringing word, youth. Wheaton managed to murmur, "I'm sorry you wrote me. I'd rather you'd told me."

Marsden's teeth snapped shut upon an impatient word. "I tried to be considerate," he said, instead, and with an unmistakable air of finality.

"Oh, it isn't that!" stammered Wheaton, and turned slowly, leaving the manager's room. He walked in the midst of comprehending silence, which he no longer heeded, to his desk, to sit there dazed for the quarter-hour remaining till six o'clock. Numbed with the shock, he failed to notice other veterans through the great room in similar plight, for several envelopes had been distributed. They had received the sinister news in divers fashions, according to their type. One sat crushed, like Wheaton; another scowled blackly and rattled papers viciously; a third stout soul contrived to smile and chat with a neighbor, an effort plainly forced.

The whistles sounded. Mechanically Wheaton turned out his desk light, and securing hat and topcoat, left the office. At the door he found himself in company with the man that had scowled and was scowling still.

"So you're in it, too," observed Fred Stockwell, a glum old bookkeeper that nobody liked, and who returned the compliment with enthusiasm. "Five of us out, on account of him!" he snarled, pointing to the tall form of a man who had just left the office and was crossing the street ahead. "That cursed expert! Expert! Yes, in figuring to take bread out of men's mouths."

Wheaton's sense of justice remained undimmed. "He's just earning his living, same as we have been."

"'Have been' is good!" retorted his companion, bitterly. "We've worked like dogs for 'em all these years—twenty-five for me and longer for you—and what do we get? Thrown out like worn-out gears!"

Still persisted Wheaton's sense of justice, in dreary acquiescence to the inevitable, the sardonic way of the world. "Oh, I don't know; we've had our wages."

"Wages!" repeated the bookkeeper, with an indescribable inflection. Why not a property right? So asked the tone. His jaws snapped shut and his vengeful gaze followed the retreating form of the expert. Wheaton turned away.

"Where are you going?" asked Stockwell. "The car's coming."

The accountant smiled wanly. "I can't afford it. I feel extra poor, all of a sudden."

He trudged the weary mile and a half to his little flat in the West End. Heavily he mounted the stairs. His wife, a little gray dove of a woman, had opened the door at his step. With the sight of his face, from which he could not quite banish the lines of this new and grave anxiety, she bent forward with that instant divination he had found at times uncanny.

"What is the matter, dear?"

She had marched shoulder to shoulder with him for forty years. Hers was no timorous soul requiring to be shielded from the breath of adversity. Very simply he stated his case, queerly relieved at sharing his burden with a spirit stronger than his own.

"I'm given two weeks' notice at the office, mother. I'm too old."

The delicate face opposite him went gray for a moment. Then his oppressed heart swelled painfully at the miracle of a brave smile forced for him.

"You must have supper, father," she told him, her voice quivering ever so slightly, "and then we'll talk it over."

She fairly willed him to eat a little. Near the end he placed his thin, blue-veined hand over her own. "Mother!" he murmured chokingly. The eyes that smiled back into his own held all the love of their springtime, and more.

The ensuing conference he never forgot. She bent her strong will to the cheering of his flagging spirit; he sank into slumber almost in an optimistic glow. But long after he was sleeping peacefully, she lay in darkness with brooding eyes. For she realized too well what a workaday tragedy it is to grow old.

However, it was with a brave smile that she sent him away in the morning with his frugal lunch, which he invariably carried in a tiny handbag. At noon he hurried through it, then nervously entered the telephone booth, in accordance with the plan he had talked over with his wife. He emerged at one o'clock, his face gray with discouragement. Mechanically he pursued his monotonous tasks of the afternoon.

Once he looked up as a man passed his desk. It was the expert, tall and spare, gray as himself. The words of Fred Stockwell recurred to Wheaton: "Expert in figuring to take the bread from men's mouths." Yet somehow he could not feel resentment. The little man possessed the compensating grace given many who fail to win material success: he was a philosopher. So he was unstirred in the presence even of this man, whose keen, cold intellect had found the veteran a useless cog in the machine. The expert's bread and butter came from the Wheatons of the world, leaving them hungry. It was monstrous enough in a sense, but the little gray man recognized the need for it in the quickening commercial scheme. Waste could not be treasured; it must go to the slag heap.

Wheaton was silent that evening until his wife had cleared away the scarcely tasted supper. Then, in dressing-gown and slippers, he repaired to the living-room, where she sat down opposite him, wistfully expectant. "I called up Dobbs and the Epps Gear Company and Brown & Stone. I happened to get all three office managers, unusual for the noon hour. You see, luck was with me, that far. They all know who I am, too. But I couldn't get even an interview. They were kind—but there was no opening. Mother, I'm too old."

After a desolate pause he continued: "They want young men, dear—like I was once—like Tom was—when—"

His voice broke huskily. The little gray woman sprang from her chair and came to him, bending over him in brooding love. Her thin hand closed over his own, hiding the quaint old ring that was so dear, yet which recalled such poignant memories.

He drew her down beside him, upon the arm of his easy chair. They presented what is perhaps the most somber of earth's pictures, Darby and Joan in genteel poverty, facing a sordid crisis—and facing it alone. For the ring told the story of a grave filled for twenty years—a boy who had been an only child. The wounds in the hearts of each of them bled now as then, as they would bleed until the end. They sat for a long time silent, with wet eyes. Then she bent and with trembling lips kissed the ring.

The days seemed fairly to fly toward the dreaded moment of chaos. When his services with the big farming machinery concern should be completed, a meager bank fund of two hundred dollars intervened for Wheaton's use ere, lacking work, he and his wife would have to accept dependency. And in this case it could mean only the dependency of the almshouse.

The accountant had at the best earned only a moderate income, and his salary during the past ten years had been but half the high water mark of twenty years before—when the boy had died. Till then the father had shown a steady, clocklike type of ambition that promised progress. But when Tom died the mainspring of his father's life had broken; he settled mechanically into a narrow groove, with the inevitable result. Advancing years had brought lessening responsibilities, with corresponding depreciation in income; now the slender need for him was outworn. For the potential requirement of business is that it shall be insensate; those that serve its imperious need must indulge private griefs and crosses outside its portals. Wheaton was merely paying the price any man must pay who has not grown a shell for the workaday hours, whether or no he discard it when the evening whistles blow.

The fateful day arrived—a dreary day with sullen, intermittent gusts of snow. Wheaton sat at his desk, his mood gray as the outer skies. He was haggard; he looked ill. Anxiety had dealt cruelly with him; he faced the empty future with sick despair. He had polled the larger manufacturing and mercantile establishments of Wallingham; he had telephoned; he had written notes; he had secured a few interviews. It had been all to no purpose; he was too old.

The veteran was occupying his chair in the dim corner for the last time. His mind, like his hands at the moment, seemed strangely empty. He felt a dull satisfaction that all had been put to rights; he wondered mechanically what he should do when he left the building, footloose and tragically free. He had been puttering at his desk all the afternoon. Some personal keepsakes were tied in a neat bundle to be taken home; all office records were left in their proper places. It lacked an hour of closing time.

Somebody paused by Wheaton's desk. He glanced up wearily to behold Fred Stockwell, the sour-faced bookkeeper, who, with Wheaton and several other luckless others, was finishing his duties on that day.

"Come on," said Stockwell, gruffly. "The rest of us are getting out now. Four-thirty is the pay-hour here; we've got our envelopes. What's the use of waiting any longer? Come."

"No," answered Wheaton, with a forced smile. "Six o'clock is the quitting hour. I'll stay till then."

"You're a fool!" growled Stockwell, and departing, slammed the big front door viciously. In his wake followed the others, some sad, others defiant; another with forced gaiety and cheerful farewells; each according to his stripe.

Left to himself, Wheaton sat huddled over his desk, slipping the odd ring up and down the third finger of his left hand, a habit he had when engrossed. A slender member at best, the finger was now grown painfully thin. Without difficulty Wheaton drew off the valuable ruby in its quaint setting and held it, regarding it fixedly. In his depressed mood the stone, an heirloom for generations, seemed to emit a sullen, sinister gleam.

A fool? Ah, yes, he had been a fool. He knew too well when the mainspring of his life had snapped. And yet, the dead are God's; the living owe a duty to the living. With the fury of a potential shock there came to the old man for the first time the full and bitter lesson of his broken years. Which of them—the two that were left—had been the greater sufferer? He knew now. From the moment when they had turned from the boy's grave, she, the little gray woman with the heart of oak, she had borne the husband's burden and her own. A shell of a man, selfish in his grief, he had leaned upon her—and now he was dragging her with him to chaos.

The ring fell from the old man's nerveless fingers upon the desk. Unheeding, he buried his tortured face in his hands and bent his gray head. Unnoticed in his dim corner he sat for a long time, nor did he hear approaching footsteps. He looked up dazed as the nasal voice of an office boy sounded in his ear.

"Mr. Marsden wants to see you in his office, Mr. Wheaton."

The old man stared incredulous, the stagnant blood within him gathering slow force, pounding faster and faster within his arteries, mounting in staccato jets upward to his brain. What could this mean—unless . . . ? He stumbled to his feet, swayed giddily an instant, and presently found himself somehow in John Marsden's office, his tongue touching dry lips, his yearning soul in his faded eyes.

The manager smiled, a grim smile of understanding. "Sit down, Mr. Wheaton," he said, indicating a chair directly opposite his desk.

The accountant was thankful for the invitation; he felt strangely weak. With characteristic abruptness the manager plunged into his business.

"Have you secured another position?"

"No, sir," replied Wheaton, unsteadily. "I guess I'm too old."

"Bah!" retorted his chief. "It isn't years; it's the ruts we let ourselves get into. Why, the youngest man I know is eighty-five. All the same, I'm glad they thought you were too old, for I can offer you something worth while."

Wheaton gasped while the manager swept on. "I've liked you from the first. I heard with regret that our expert had abolished your job. Really, you can't blame him; with our improved system, that position is superfluous. Several others went out today. I will state frankly that in the case of each of them there were several reasons. In yours there was but one."

The old man was leaning forward, breathless. "Then—I am to stay?"

"No. But you are to go elsewhere, if you like. The night you learned of your coming release I chanced to stand behind you and Stockwell as you went out; I walked along, close to you, to the corner. I heard what he said and what you replied. I got a glimpse of business light you have kept hidden under a bushel of late years, Wheaton. A breadth of view, sound logic, common sense! It set me thinking; I've been thinking ever since. And to-night, right around the corner from your desk, I heard Stockwell and you talking again. It decided me; I sent for you."

"As you may know, I have a country place ten miles out. I have the market gardening fad. I have to have a right hand man, a superintendent, for details. Within the past month I have found the present incumbent intemperate and dishonest. He's gone. You used to know the farming game, I believe?"

"I was brought up on one," huskily supplied the veteran. "I invented a couple of devices afterward that other people got rich from. I used to think that some day I'd go back to farming."

"Well, here's your chance, if you like. I need a man of loyalty, of capacity for detail, of that executive ability that you showed once so strongly. I have heard of it, I learned what interrupted it, and I am sorry. However, in new scenes you'll regain it. It's a hard road, this life, Wheaton, but we must go on to the end. If you want to move out there with your good wife, I can offer you a fine little cottage, your keep and a salary considerably better than you have been drawing here. This is a trial, of course, but I feel confident of the outcome. Will you accept?"

"Will I accept?"

The little man's face was working uncontrollably. He started up to reach across the desk and grasp Marsden's hand. At that moment the door was flung open. A man faced them, a tall, spare, clean-shaven fellow with iron-gray hair. At the look of him they recoiled. He was the costs expert, Addison Fleming, in the full grip of some strange emotion.

Striding to the desk of the manager, while both men watched him fascinated, he flung down upon it a small object. He questioned hoarsely, his voice scarcely audible:

"Marsden, whose is it?"

The manager looked up in wonderment. "I have noticed it because of its peculiarity. It belongs to Mr. Wheaton here."

"Wheaton!"

The expert whirled toward the old accountant, his face convulsed. "Wait!" he cried. "Wait . . . let me think!"

His face grew tense; he advanced toward the old man, who sat trembling with a strange premonition. The tall man's eyes seemed piercing the elder through and through; his brow contracted gruesomely with an agony within, as if he groped in darkness for redeeming light. Marsden, with the look of one gazing upon a madman, sprang from his chair.

Then the face of the man that had been Addison Fleming for twenty years changed in a flash to a wonderful tenderness, to ineffable marveling.

"Ah," he cried, "thank God! Father, look at me. I am Tom!"

The old man lived a moment that seemed crowded with eternity. Wordless he sat, with fingers twisted about the arms of his chair; sat and gazed and gazed, while gradually the strong face opposite that was coming nearer to him, as the hands of the expert were outstretched in yearning, melted weirdly into rounder, ruddier outlines, the gray hair regained its youthful brown. Then the form of the accountant crumpled like a leaf.

It might have been a moment, it might have been ages ere he revived to find a glass of water pressed against his lips. He swallowed weakly. Then he opened his eyes. He caught the cool hand that had rested upon his brow, holding it as a zealot clings to faith. Marsden was softly closing the door, excluding a wondering huddle of attachés, attracted by the unwonted commotion.

"But, Tom," Wheaton muttered stupidly, "we buried you after that railroad wreck; your body was identified by the ring." He shuddered violently. "And your hair is as gray as mine. Boy! . . . I am dead, dreaming in my grave—"

"Listen, father. I was on my way to take my first position as accountant, you'll remember. I fell in with a traveling companion of my own age. Curiously enough, we were dressed nearly alike. He had commented on the ring, the heirloom you gave me when I went away, and was trying it on his finger when the crash came. If you buried me . . . why, it is he that lies in my grave. And, dad, dear old dad—what—what of—mother?"

"At home—waiting."

"God is good!" The tall man's voice was breaking. "Just us three—as then—for I've never married. Well, dad, they discharged me from a Philadelphia hospital with a mended skull and a big blank in the cells inside. I had completely lost my identity; you have read of such cases. My hair was as gray as it is now. I have not known my age for twenty years—I must be forty now. I found a card in the pocket of my clothing, the only scrap for my identification. I had on a new suit; my baggage was lost, of course; there wasn't a letter; there was nothing. The card was his, I remember now; the man who had put on my ring. I took his name, hoping it would lead to some clue that would disclose my own identity. It never did. Well, my natural bent for figures remained unchanged; I have won success with that poor fellow's name. I have not dishonored it. And now I shall discard it for my own.

"And just now, dad, I chanced to see the dear old ring upon your desk out there. The sight of it—it was awful! It started my mind groping—groping—it led me to the dear old dad that loved me from the time I was that long! . . . my old chum dad! . . . the dad I fired! May God forgive me! But I'll make it up to you, dad; I've got enough; you need never work nor worry again—"

"Wait, laddie!"

Marsden's eyes moistened at the thrilling pathos in the old pet name. Roger Wheaton's face was a glory of resurrected dreams, of broken destiny miraculously restored. His voice rang out in exultation.

"Worry? It is done. Work? As never before. Mr. Marsden is in luck. I'll show him some waste resurrected! Why, laddie, I'm younger than you—I'll bet I'll throw you after supper, for all your six feet and the big shoulders on you. The old man's all there, yet. I can't—I can't realize it yet—but mother will! Let's go home to her, laddie—let's—let's go—home!"

Palmolive Differs From Any Other Soap

Not only the ingredients but the effect of Palmolive is different. It lathers abundantly in hard as well as soft water. Palmolive contains no free alkali. Its lather entirely rinses off, leaving no film of soap in the pores. Thus the skin is perfectly cleansed and nourished. These two oils have ever been the choice of women who know and achieve complexion beauty.

Olive oil is such an important skin food that it is used for the baby's first bath. Now doctors and nurses prescribe this to be followed by a daily Palmolive bath, as Palmolive is the olive oil soap. Palmolive is best for the bath and toilet of every member of your family. For it leaves every skin soft and velvety.

Palmolive's cost is no greater than ordinary soap. Your dealer will supply you, or for two 2-cent stamps we will send you a generous free sample and booklet, "The Easy Way to Beauty."

Mont-Lawn's Season Ended

AFTER a most delightful summer, during which nearly three thousand little tenement boys and girls were received and entertained, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn closed the season's work on Saturday, September 7. The last week was a series of affectionate leave-takings.

Many blessings have come to the Home this season, for which its management is sincerely thankful. In the first place, the season has been unusually free from sickness, and the little Home hospital has been, for the most part, empty. Even during the hottest weather, when the children in the cities were suffering and dying, our little guests at Mont-Lawn rejoiced in cooling breezes and restful, invigorating nights.

For nearly a week after the children had departed, Matron Goering and her helpers were busy putting things to rights. There was a great pile of laundry to be laid away, fresh and clean, for next year's opening; hundreds of little dresses, and quilts, and bedding, etc., all to be inventoried. Many kind friends of the work have sent in gifts of clothing this season, which have been greatly appreciated. Contributions from patrons in all parts of the country have enabled the management to keep up the work to its highest standard of efficiency in all departments. These friends, through their generosity, have been the means of bringing untold happiness into the hearts of a great army of little children, who will remember their kindness with pleasure during the months that are to come.

"Standard" GUARANTEED PLUMBING FIXTURES

THE love of cleanliness should be developed in children by making cleanliness a pleasure rather than a duty.

"Standard" Fixtures by appealing to the child's mind through its love of the beautiful make cleanliness attractive. Every member of the household feels the refining influence of "Standard" Fixtures.

Genuine "Standard" fixtures for the Home and for School, Office Buildings, Public Institutions, etc., are identified by the Green and Gold Label, with the exception of one brand of baths bearing the Red and Black Label, which, while of the first quality of manufacture, have a slightly thinner enameling, and thus meet the requirements of those who demand "Standard" quality at less expense. All "Standard" fixtures, with care, will last a lifetime. And no fixture is genuine unless it bears the guarantee label. In order to avoid substitution of inferior fixtures, specify "Standard" goods in writing (not verbally) and make sure that you get them.

Election Results in Maine

THE final returns from all sections of the State of Maine make the vote of the State for governor in the election held September 9 as follows:

William T. Haines (Republican), 70,928.

Frederick W. Plaisted (Democrat), 67,905.

These results show a remarkable change of political sentiment since the last election which was in 1910. The Republican plurality this year is 3,023. Governor Plaisted's plurality in 1910 was 8,735.

For the State Senate and House of Representatives the returns show that there will be in the Senate 23 Republicans to eight Democrats, and in the House 79 Republicans and 72 Democrats. The political alignment for this recent election was that of a coalition of the Republican and Progressive parties against the Democrats. With the election over, however, the successful co-operation of the two parties under single leadership came to an end and the Progressive leaders stated that they would henceforth work along independent lines seeking for Roosevelt presidential electors in Maine. In the Democratic camp, although beaten in the elections, the leaders seemed encouraged by one significant fact. As compared with the vote for Governor in the last presidential year, the Democratic vote gained while the Republican vote, despite the union of the two factions which formerly composed that party, fell off.

Sunday-School Lesson

A traveler was following his guide in an Alpine climb. He followed without fear, because he had perfect confidence in his guide. But suddenly the traveler hesitated. His guide had stepped across a narrow but very deep, dark chasm, and then held out his hand, asking the traveler to grasp it, but still he hesitated, looking down into the chasm. "Take my hand," urged the guide; "that hand never let go a man." Then the traveler put out his hand, and it was firmly grasped by the guide, and the chasm was crossed in safety.

The living hope: it is the grasp we have on Christ.

I like the sweet, old-fashioned phrase,
"A living hope in Christ";
How many saints of elder days
It gloriously sufficed!

"A living hope"—why, then it breathes,
And fashions kindly speech;
With cheery song its life enwreathes,
With courage dares to teach.

"A living hope"—why, then it walks,
With steady step and swift,
Where beggars crouch and evil stalks,
And brings the needed gift.

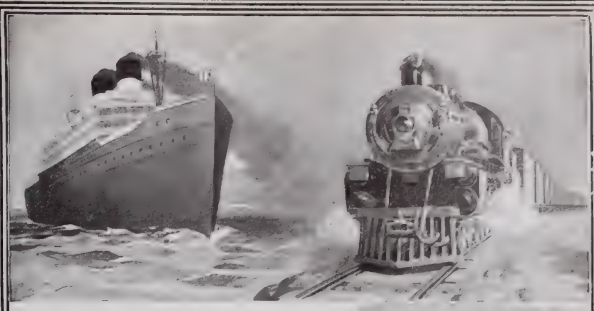
"A living hope"—it labors then,
It laughs, and, pitying, sighs;
It lifts the life of earthly men,
It lives—and never dies.

AMOS R. WELLS.

General Notes

—HON. ROBERT G. VALENTINE resigned, on September 10, his office as United States Commissioner of Indian Affairs under the Department of the Interior.

—OUTWITTING SIX great Powers, who have been for a number of months trying to negotiate with China for accepting a loan on what they considered safe terms, an American engineer, Mr. A. Wendall Jackson, succeeded in closing a contract with the Chinese minister at London by which the new republic accepts a loan of $50,000,000 through the Lloyds Bank. The negotiations with the six Powers were delayed because China would not consent to the terms demanding supervision of her finances. The contract with Mr. Jackson leaves China free to handle the money, but provides for supervision in case interest is not promptly paid. The chief security is the republic's income from the duty on salt.



By boat and train and caravan the peoples of the earth send for this Oatmeal

The oat-loving peoples, nearly all the world over, give preference to Quaker Oats.

In the British Isles—home of the Scotch oats—the favorite oatmeal is Quaker.

So in Australia, so in India, so in Germany and Austria.

We send tens of millions of packages across the seas, to those who want the utmost in oatmeal.

Ecstasy of Flavor

The reason is this:

The delight in oatmeal lies in an exquisite flavor. A flavor found only in the rich, plump grains.

We pick out those grains from the choicest crops by 62 separate siftings.

From a bushel of oats—weighing 32 pounds—we get only 10 pounds of Quaker.

So, one gets in this brand just the cream of the oats—just the ecstasy of flavor. And our process makes it doubly delicious.

It is that wondrous flavor, maintained 25 years, which has won the world to Quaker.

Quaker Oats

For Breakfast and Supper

One can't get this flavor from puny grains. It isn't in lesser oatmeal. There's nothing haphazard about it.

We get it by careful selection. You get it by ordering the Quaker brand.

That is all. We ask no premium for it. Quaker Oats, despite its quality, costs but one-half cent per dish.

A thousand million dishes will be served this winter, in homes of those who know.

For your children's sake, let your home be one of them. You want them to love oatmeal.

Regular Size package, 10c

Family size package, for smaller cities and country trade, 25c.

The prices noted do not apply in the extreme West or South.

Look for the Quaker trademark on every package

Talmage
Expressed His Greatness of Soul

Talmage
Copyright 1902, Falk

WHY was Talmage the greatest preacher of his time? Because he made his hearers feel the feelings that surged within him.

Moody was great because he made his audience feel the torrent of emotion that came over him as he spoke.

Paderewski, the pianist, is great because he expresses in music all the love, sternness, joy, sadness and poetry of his nature, so that his hearers feel what he feels.

Paderewski

There is greatness of soul in all of us, if we only have the means for pouring forth our stifled feelings. That is the whole secret of the

THE NEW INSTINCTIVE PLAYER PIANO

Each and every owner of a Virtuolo has been astonished to find how marvelously it releases his pent-up instincts; how it makes him able in playing to express all the emotions that a piece of music stirs within him.

For example, you can actually make your hearers feel all the stirring patriotism of "The Star Spangled Banner," the uplifting inspiration of "Abide With Me," or the homely tenderness of "Annie Laurie" when you play these pieces on the Virtuolo. Whereas, if you play the piano by hand, the chances are that unless you are a genius, you will not even be able to please yourself.

Read This Great Book

"The Inner Beauty" will open the gate for you into the enchanted land of music. It tells plainly how the actual feelings of the great composers can be transmitted direct to you. It is a book full of truth, a wonderful book which makes clear how Instinct is given free scope on the Virtuolo to produce the most beautiful music. It shows you how you can get a hundredfold more pleasure and benefit out of music than ever before.

There is a copy awaiting you. Send for it. We will mail it free for your name and address on the attached coupon. After you have read "The Inner Beauty" you will say that you would not have missed reading it for the world.

The Virtuolo is made by the Hallet & Davis Piano Company—one of the oldest piano concerns in America—established 1839. It comes in the famous Hallet & Davis Piano, as well as the Conway Piano, another fine instrument. Three years in which to pay, if desired. Ask your piano dealer to order a Virtuolo for your free trial, in his store or in your own home.

HEAVEN, WHERE IS IT?

IN the Book of Revelation we are told that heaven's principal city has walls of jasper, gates of pearl, and streets of gold. Figurative language, no doubt. According to the words of our Lord, he would have little or no appreciation for anything of that kind; for he tells us that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like the lily of the field. With Jesus and with the wise and prudent, the flowers of the field and the birds of the air are our Father's work and far surpass Solomon in all his wealth and glory.

When we enter into his rest, art and vanity, the work of man, will be things of the past. It is written: "Here we have no continuing city," but we seek one "whose builder and whose maker is God." He feeds, clothes and cares for the birds of the air and the flowers of the field, and tells us that we are of much more value than these. When we leave this world, our Lord will have for us cities which we build—not olive yards and vineyards which we planted not.

As such will be our home that fadeth not away, we can look for nature in all its charms and beauty. Groves and wild woods, far surpassing in beauty the trees of Lebanon; smiling meadows, rolling hills and towering mountains, interspersed in every direction with bright, flowing streams of living water, the air made melodious with the songs of birds and freighted with the odor of flowers; trees and vines loaded with every manner of fruit needful for a hale and happy people.

In our meditation, we often ask ourselves: "Where is this goodly land?" It would be an easier matter to tell where it is than where it is not. God's kingdom is unlimited. From us its boundary line is not far away. According to the Word, we are not separated from heaven, our abode of rest, by vast space, impregnable walls or gates, but by a deprivation of senses without which it is impossible for us to see or perceive heaven or those who abide there.

Our God, in answer to those who asked him when the kingdom of God would come, answered that the kingdom of God "cometh not with observation, neither shall they say: Lo, here; lo, there, for behold, the kingdom of God is within you." And such indeed is the real truth. Our Lord tells us: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Sin is the dark wall we cannot see through. It is when this veil of flesh is taken away that we shall see God in all his glory and his kingdom in all its beauty.

We are glad heaven is a sphere of existence much more exalted every way than this world in which we live. We cannot see its people, though they can see and visit us. The Egyptians could not see the destroying angel, nor could the Assyrian army as they were about to lay siege to Jerusalem. The arm of flesh, fettered with sin, is a hopeless defense in time of need. We never know how weak and frail we are until brought face to face with Death, the king of terrors.

With all our faults, it is fortunate for us that there is a sure and safe way to heaven, our abode of rest. For the anxious faithful there is nothing to fear. They can have with them the anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast. As written, they can abide under the shadow of the Almighty. He gives his angels charge over them to keep them in all their ways. When they call, he will answer them and show them his salvation.

Thank God, there is a distinction and consolation about the Christian dispensation we find in no other form of faith, and that is: no true Christian need to be in doubt! If he seeks with the whole heart, he will surely find to his entire satisfaction. It is written: "I have finished the work Thou gavest me to do." And we can thank God that we know it is a finished work. All we have to do is to be faithful to God and his word, and death will have for us no sting, the grave no victory.

HEAVEN, WHERE IS IT?

The way marked out for life is clear and legible. We have it all in those words: "Ye must be born again." There are about fifteen hundred millions of people in this world, and not one sane person among them who does not know that he is born of the flesh. How can a man hope to enter the kingdom of God (a much greater and better) who does not know that he is born of the Spirit of God?

This world of sin has made death appear to be a treacherous and unwelcome visitor; but the true Christian has no need to look on it as such, but rather as a welcome, indispensable ferryman, to row him over the Silent River to a host of loved ones waiting on the other shore.

In our rest after the toil of the day, we never enter the land of dreams until our natural senses are buried in slumber. It is then we exercise senses we cannot exercise elsewhere. And when, being possessed of the Spirit of God, we vacate this house of clay we now live in, we will exercise our latent spiritual senses in a kingdom where time cannot dim our vision, nor disease mar our appreciation of life.

Chicago, Ill. P. G. MEATH.

Called Higher

Mr. Samuel W. Palmer, of Valhalla, N. Y., an old subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, met an untimely death. He was one of God's good workers and beloved by all.

Mrs. Mary Talmer Arnold, of Thompson, Conn., passed away recently, after a life spent in helpfulness and Christian service to those who mourn her death.

Mr. Robert Gordon, of Tweed, Ont., Can., Sunday school superintendent for sixty-five years in one church.

Mrs. Mary A. Black (83), of Charlotte, N. C., passed away recently after a life of unswerving devotion to all those about her. Her saintly life was the truest type of Christianity. Mrs. Black was a great friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

D. W. Beckwith (88) was called higher recently at his home in Great Barrington, Mass. His life long he served faithfully both the church and Christianity.

George Roesler, of Potts Grove, Pa., passed away to the better land June 9, 1912. He was a loving friend and unselfish worker.

Mrs. J. W. Miller quietly fell asleep March 28, 1912, aged 69 years, at her home, Harrison, Ark. She was a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Wm. G. Calkins, of Winneconne, Wis., died June 22, 1912, at the age of 89 years. He had been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for over fifteen years.

Mrs. Rachel A. Miller Sailhamer (78), of Erie, Ill., was called to her heavenly home December 9, 1911. She was a faithful Christian throughout her life, beloved by all who knew her.

Mrs. Henry A. Youkin (81) passed away July, 1912, at her home, Riverside, Ia. She was a devoted Christian woman beloved by all.

Mrs. Mary L. Horton, of Portland, Ore., passed away June 29, 1912. She was a faithful reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Apollonia Othmer (74), of Williamsport, Pa., passed away June 25, 1912. She was a subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and took a great interest in the Bowery Mission.

Mrs. Daniel McCurdy (80), of Bedford City, Va., passed away on June 11, 1912. She was a life-long Christian.

Entered into rest May 20, 1912, Mrs. Sarah S. Hamilton, aged seventy-four years, a native of Point Coupee Parish, Louisiana. She was a devoted subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Tonnes Thompson, of Royersford, Pa., died June 29, 1912. He was a lover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Harriet Wood, of Norrisville, Pa., died June, 1911. Hers was a beautiful Christian life.

Rev. O. R. Morris (85), of Lime Spring, Ia., was called higher July 10, 1912. He was in the ministry over fifty years, and was a subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD over thirty years.

Mrs. Jane Morris, Lime Spring, Ia., passed away July 12, 1912, at the age of fifty-seven years.

On August 20, 1912, at Flanders, N. J., Mrs. Lucretia Fairbanks Robinson Stout passed to the other land and fuller life at the age of seventy-two years. She was a sincere Christian and a faithful and efficient helper to her husband, Rev. William Stout, in his pastoral work.

The Charm of a Smile

No Matter How—

beautiful the face is in repose, the animation of a brilliant smile adds irresistible charm.

Even the plain woman with fine teeth fascinates by her smile.

Too many women fear to smile because a misdirected care of the teeth has robbed them of their greatest claim to beauty.

Habitual Dr. Lyon's users smile because

Dr. Lyon's PERFECT
Tooth Powder

prepared for almost half a century by a doctor of dental surgery, keeps the teeth beautiful by keeping them in a state of perfect soundness and cleanliness.

Dr. Lyon's is not a preparation which can injure the tooth enamel, but a soft velvety powder which cleans and polishes the teeth by gentle friction, the only safe way.

It contains no glycerine, glucose, gelatine or saccharine to lodge between the teeth and encourage decay.

Dr. Lyon's refreshes, sweetens the breath and removes discolorations and tartar. Only a dentist is competent to do more.

Four smiling generations now attest the efficiency and harmlessness of Dr. Lyon's, the standard dentifrice. The life-long use by millions of people is the best proof of its safety and preservative action. Make the use of Dr. Lyon's one of your children's daily habits.

What Dr. Lyon's does not do only your dentist is competent to do.

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

VACATION time and harvest days are over, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Class can settle down to a little harder work and, we hope, still prompter replies. Many readers are getting the benefit of the Bible study involved in hunting out the answers to these monthly lists of Scripture questions. It is a good time to join the class if you have not already done so. No preliminaries are necessary. Begin at once, and send us as many answers as you can to the new list of questions appearing below.

Remember that this Bible study will not only be a most enjoyable way of spending some of these autumn hours, in afternoon or evening, but that it will store your mind with valuable information and give you a familiarity with the Scriptures which will be of great help to you in your own spiritual life and in the Christian work you have to do in church, young people's meeting, Sunday school, or in your associations at home and with your friends.

Every one owes it to himself to learn all he can about the Bible. In the list below are some questions of special human interest, some of curious interest, some of deep spiritual interest and value. Find the answers.

Answers to List No. 8, and the announcement of the Honor Roll will appear in next week's issue.

Remember that it is specially important to mail your answers promptly.

These are the new questions:

LIST NUMBER 9

1. What prophet said: "I am no prophet"?
2. What New Testament preacher gave special advice to soldiers?
3. What were the contents of the Ark of the Covenant?
4. What king failed, by exhibiting to a prophet a lack of energy and perseverance, to win the promise of completely exterminating his enemy?
5. Mention three occasions described in the Old Testament where the special presence of God was indicated by fire.
6. On what occasion were two sad pedestrians cheered by a fellow traveler who joined them?
7. What two men of New Testament times were taken on one occasion to be gods?
8. What two women are mentioned in the New Testament, each of whom had a name of three syllables, beginning with the letters "Try"?
9. When did 276 men partake of a joyful meal at a time of extreme peril?
10. Who, besides the governor himself, was the only person to raise a voice in defense of Jesus during his trial?
11. To what four things does Peter, in his epistles, apply the word "precious"?
12. What fourteen rewards to overcomers are promised in the book of Revelation?

identity of the Tomb and to decide against the site in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, although the latter is still recognized by the multitudes of pilgrims who visit Palestine. In recent years there has been renewed controversy as to the exact locality, and at the present time Gordon's Calvary, as Mr. Robinson, the writer of the foregoing article, states, is seriously considered by many eminent Bible students who have made it a special subject of investigation. Others are still divided on the question. It is urged that the place of the crucifixion and the sepulcher are now situated in the heart of the modern city, whereas the Gospels illustrate that they were "without the city"; but, on the other hand, it is pointed out that Jerusalem topographically has undergone many changes since the time of Christ. The present walls of the city were erected centuries afterward, and a part of the originally enclosed city identified as belonging to Mount Zion, originally within the walls, is now outside. It is pointed out as a probability that if there was contraction in one section of the city, there may have been expansion in some other part when the walls were rebuilt, and that if the city was enlarged in its northern boundaries in proportion as it was diminished on the south. Golgotha would naturally have been brought well within the walls, although originally outside.

Hon. Selah Merrill, formerly American consul general in Jerusalem, and for many years a contributor to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was regarded as an authority on this question, to which he had given closest investigation. Dr. Merrill, in his book, Ancient Jerusalem, wrote that the devastation in Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and A.D. 135 had practically obliterated every vestige of the Saviour's Tomb. A still later authority, the Schaff-Herzog Biblical Encyclopedia, says that in the time of Eusebius there was apparently no doubt whatever as to the actual locality. Indeed, it had never been in doubt until after A.D. 135, when a historic catastrophe buried the entire city. In later years, the site of the tomb became a subject of speculation. General Gordon, in 1883, made discoveries indicating that it was on the small rocky eminence outside of the Damascus Gate. E. M. Clos, another investigator, held that it was on a spot two hundred yards south of the present church. Dr. Trumbull wrote: "I know that the idea has been scouted that these present cavities in the face of the rock next to Jeremiah's Grotto can have any bearing on the identification of this knoll as Golgotha, the Place of a Skull. Yet no man can settle that site beyond dispute. And many a one loves to believe that that Christian warrior was right, General Charles George Gordon, whose name, though he was in no sense the discoverer, has become so linked with this site that it is even called "Gordon's Calvary"; that it was not on the Golgotha claimed by the great Church of the Sepulcher, but here on this hill, still covered only by God's blue sky, that the Cross of Christ was lifted up, bearing the body of the Messiah, that he might draw all men unto him."

AMONG THE WORKERS

—HENRY W. BROMLEY, the evangelist, writes: "The Lord gave us a blessed victory at Superior, Neb. About three hundred were led to the Saviour, besides a good work done among the church people. We crave the continued prayers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family."

—AN INVALID and shut-in, William K. Quillin, of Spencer, N. C., writes to ask whether some of our readers would not be willing to send him some entertaining reading matter. He receives THE CHRISTIAN HERALD regularly, but would be thankful to get some papers, books or magazines.

—A DAUGHTER of Pundita Ramabai writes from Muku, Kedgaon, India: "Kindly convey to your readers our very grateful thanks for their practical sympathy in the Lord's work here. The people are in special need at present. For so far in this district we have not had the much looked for rains, and the people are in sore distress. May He who notes even a cup of cold water given in his name reward each kind donor."

—THE ELIM HOME, a well-known resting-place for city missionaries and other Christian workers, at Bell Island, South Norwalk, Conn., has been more than usually overcrowded this season. Rev. William James, the manager of the home, writes that it has been an extremely busy summer, and the demands upon the hospitality of the home have been unusually heavy. Any one interested in the Elim Home may communicate with Dr. William James.

Montessori's "Houses of Childhood"

experiments and sees for himself can guess how great may be the harvest from the sowing of such seeds."

And so on and on through the entire story of the Montessori work of education. Practical common sense is the basis of it, and unquestionably is the secret of its widespread appeal.

Dr. Henry W. Holmes, of the Division of Education of Harvard University, says of it in his able preface to Montessori's book:

"It is wholly in the bounds of safe judgment to call Dr. Montessori's work remarkable, novel and important. Original at least in its systematic wholeness and in its practical application, worked out and inaugurated as it has been by the feminine mind and hand, it is remarkable because it springs from a combination of womanly sympathy and intuition, broad social outlook, scientific training, intensive and long-continued study of educational problems, and wide experience as a teacher. No other woman who has dealt with the education of young children has brought to it personal researches so richly diverse."

A system which embodies such a capital of human effort could not be unimportant. The attention of the ultra-modern educational world is largely centered upon it, and no student of childhood, no teacher of elementary branches can afford to overlook it.

JANET PORTER.

The Lord's Prayer

(Arranged to sing to common meter tune.)

OUR Father God, who art in heaven,
All hallowed be thy name;
Thy kingdom come, thy will be done,
In heaven and earth the same.

Give us this day our daily bread,
And as we those forgive
Who sin against us, so may we Forgiving grace receive.

Into temptation lead us not;
From evil set us free:
And thine the kingdom, thine the power,
And glory ever be.

The above arrangement was published in George F. Boot's Diapason (tune book) in the early sixties, when I was a boy. I hope you will rescue it from oblivion.

Folks Who Have Pet Corns

Millions of corns are kept growing for years. Think of it—painful corns.

Folks pare them occasionally—take off the top layer. Then let them keep on growing.

Or they doctor them in some old-time ineffective way.

Millions of others take out their corns with a little Blue-jay plaster. The pain stops at once. Then the B & B wax—a famous chemist's invention—gently undermines the corn. In two days it all comes out.

No pain, no soreness, no discomfort whatever.

A million corns monthly are removed in that way. Perhaps a million others are simply pared and kept.

Which, in your opinion, is the wise way to treat corns? Try the new way and see.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Blue-jay Corn Plasters

Sold by Druggists—15c and 25c per package

"GET ON" IS A GOOD MOTTO

Statue in Paris of Charles Perrault

EAR BOYS AND GIRLS: Vacation days are , and once more busy lesson times here. Somehow eems a bit too to be getting to school, does ot? Too soon, er the splendid vacation, to be- to plod away at ous things. It is to be with your ns and compan- again, though, r all, the days long enough school work and ty of play be- ; and, believe it is all right if parents and hers do insist you "get on" at ol. Do not fall behind at the start be bothered all the year with try- to catch up. Take time to learn lessons each day as they come g. This is the best way, and there argument whatever against it.

"et on" is a pretty good motto. It sily recalled and hits the mark, means something.

ore than fifty years ago my grand- er, one of the old school chancel- of New Jersey, gave this bit of e to a boy employed in his office. the best you can to get on, my and plan all the time to do better." t long ago I met that "small boy," in the course of conversation, as were walking up a mountain road e Swiss Alps, he told me how he never forgotten that piece of ad- "nor the big earnest way in which ld chancellor said it." And I love ll you now, my CHRISTIAN HERALD and girls, that this same small is one of the greatest and most American statesmen to-day. Like cho he heard the words, "Do the you can, and plan all the time to etter." And he got on.

heartily enjoy all of your letters. e is never one too many, and gh the answers must sometimes be ved because I do not want to send hurried letters, they will surely to you before long.

e have chosen for our good-night e this week:

answered and said unto them. He that the good seed is the Son of Man; the the world; the good seed are the children kingdom; the harvest is the end of the ; and the reapers are the angels.

Did You Know This?

E boys and girls of Paris have is year erected a very beautiful e to the man who more than two uries ago saved from old-fashioned eries and chimney corners the es of Puss in Boots, Cinderella, ing Beauty, Hop-o'-my-Thumb, beard, Little Red Riding Hood and more, besides much of Mother e, and passed them along to com- generations. What Charles Per- did was to impart to these tales rm so simple, so straightforward at the same time so charming they have remained through all ese years the delight not only of and girls, but of older people as rrault himself gave the lion's of credit for their authorship s little son, whose name appeared he original collection of these es published in Paris so many s ago.

rrault is to France what Hans stian Andersen is to Denmark, brothers Grimm to Germany, Mr. Andrew Lang to English- cing boys and girls; and the be- iated tribute to his memory is a beautiful thought and well merited.

The statue stands in the Tuileries Gardens, which by his efforts were preserved forever as a playground for the children of Paris; and it will interest you all to know that the modeling class in a very delightful school for younger boys and girls in the neighborhood of the Tuileries has been going every day this summer to have their lesson in modeling near the new statue, and their models are the three ring-around-a-rosy girls and the princely Puss in Boots which surround the pedestal.

A Prize for Every One

I AM sorry about the Cozy Corner Mascot Prize Contest, which we were obliged to call off. Everything is perfectly fair about it now, and a beautiful Cozy Corner Mascot Prize will be sent to all who send names and addresses of their friends (three at least), who are likely to become friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Cozy Corner. The names, of course, must all be new.

The Mascot prizes are truly lovely, and there are charming souvenirs, too, for the friends whose names and addresses you send, so send as many as you care to. Every one is welcome. Don't forget the self-addressed and stamped envelope for your own self. And

I am lovingly always,

CAREFUL DOCTOR

Prescribed Change of Food Instead of Drugs.

It takes considerable courage for a doctor to deliberately prescribe only food for a despairing patient, instead of resorting to the usual list of medicines.

There are some truly scientific physicians among the present generation who recognize and treat conditions as they are and should be treated, regardless of the value to their pockets. Here's an instance:

"Four years ago I was taken with severe gastritis and nothing would stay on my stomach, so that I was on the verge of starvation.

"I heard of a doctor who had a summer cottage near me—a specialist from N. Y.—and as a last hope, sent for him.

"After he examined me carefully he advised me to try a small quantity of Grape-Nuts at first, then as my stomach became stronger to eat more.

"I kept at it and gradually got so I could eat and digest three teaspoonfuls. Then I began to have color in my face, memory became clear, where before everything seemed a blank. My limbs got stronger and I could walk. So I steadily recovered.

"Now after a year on Grape-Nuts I weigh 153 lbs. My people were surprised at the way I grew fleshy and strong on this food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

"There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WE PAY FREIGHT

Finding God in a Shutter-box

ONE beautiful afternoon in June I gladly accepted the invitation of a retired police officer to visit ex-Inspector H. V. Steevs. We found him at his home on One Hundred and Fifty-second Street. Going up the old colonial stairway we were introduced to a hearty, well-preserved gentleman, so vigorous we could hardly believe him to have passed his eightieth birthday. Two years ago he was suddenly stricken with total blindness. Despite this affliction, his simple trust in God is a continual spring of joy, and the influence of his beautiful life is still far-reaching. Knowing of his long years of excellent service as policeman in New York City, passing upward from rank to rank from patrolman to inspector, I asked him to tell me what led him to accept Jesus Christ as his Saviour. His story in brief is as follows: "Some fifty years ago a revival meeting was in progress in the lower part of the city. I was detailed there as patrolman. At first I did not enjoy my surroundings, and kept in the back part of the gallery. The interest deepened. Soon I was an interested observer of what appeared to me to be wonderful transformations. I saw those whom I had known as drunkards changed to rejoicing Christians. I saw families reunited, and such evidences of real comfort and joy coming into hearts that I cried out in the bitterness of my spirit, 'Why can't I have some of these good things also?' One night soon after this, as I patrolled the street my mind was brooding over the need of God, and in a way was reaching out to him in prayer. In those days wide board shutters were put across store fronts to protect the windows. As I neared one of the empty shutter-boxes I felt irresistibly drawn to go in. I fell upon my knees, cried out to God, confessed my sins, and asked him to make me a new man. After a little it seemed as though the very glory of heaven lighted the darkness of the night and of my soul. God had spoken to my heart. I sprang up and I believe I shouted, 'Praise God!' I hastened along my beat, walking as on air, and patrolled until 6 A.M. At that time, I met my side partner on the adjoining post, and we walked together to the station house. He was a faithful Christian, a Baptist, much older than myself. I said to him, 'Daddy, I've been praying that God would forgive me my sins and make me a Christian. While on Halsey's corner I went into the shutter-box, and prayed God to forgive me all my sins. While praying it seemed as if a light shone around me and a voice from heaven said to me, "Thy sins are all forgiven, go thy way."' The old officer grasped my hand warmly, saying, 'God bless you, Henry! God has converted you.' I said, 'What shall I do to go on in this good way? As you have been a Christian many years teach me what I must do.' He asked me: 'Do you have family prayer? Do you read your Bible? Do you say grace at meals?'

"I replied, 'I do not.' He urged me to begin by going home and commencing family prayer at once. I went home and said to my wife, 'We shall have family prayer this morning.' My wife, our little daughter, and myself fell on our knees and prayed together. We then arose, and breakfast being prepared we asked God's blessing upon it. After breakfast I read a chapter from the Bible. My wife wept from very joy, saying, 'I have been praying for this to come into your life.' God accepted the earnest purpose of my heart. During my life I have gone through many and varied experiences upon the police force, but God has been my stay, and I prize the blessed Scriptures above all else. I now repeat the promises as I sit in darkness, and the presence of Jesus is very real and blessed." J. L. SPICER,

Secretary and Chaplain Christian Police Association, New York City.

Every Live, Ambitious Boy and Girl Should ANSWER THIS : : Advertisement

NOW that vacation days are over, every progressive, wideawake boy and girl naturally is anxious to earn a little spending money after school.

We have a plan whereby any persistent boy of good character can earn a handsome weekly income. Thousands of boys are delivering copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week to their friends and customers, in the homes and places of business of the people throughout the country, and are thereby earning more than many of their friends who have left school and gone regularly to work.

The work is easy. It will not interfere with your school or home duties. It supplements them to a very large degree by helping you practice many of the principles of business which are taught in business colleges. While earning a small income, you are at the same time, through seizing this opportunity, learning to understand the value of grit and enthusiasm, of good manners and tact, of self-reliance and thoroughness; you will be making your character through CHRISTIAN HERALD work.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives to boys and girls, besides their regular weekly profits, many valuable and useful premium prizes, which any fun and home-loving boy or girl enjoys receiving. Among them are a Pony, Cart and Harness which are offered every other month; Roller Skates, Watches, Knives, Crest Pins, Etc.

In order to learn full particulars regarding this excellent plan, sign coupon below and mail it at once. All you have to do is to enclose 15 cents with this coupon. The 15 cents which you enclose will pay for 5 copies of The Christian Herald at the wholesale rate of 3 cents. In addition to this, we will send you an extra five copies in order that you may secure extra capital for ordering future issues. These ten copies can be sold at 5c. each, or 50c. As a mark of appreciation on our part, we will also send you Free one of our Gold and Enamel Christian Herald Crest Pins.

This is a special offer. Take advantage of it now. Sign the Coupon below and mail it immediately.

The Christian Herald Special Boy Coupon

I enclose with this Boy Coupon the sum of fifteen cents (15) in cash for five copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the wholesale rate of three cents each. I hereby certify that I am not now selling THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but that I will try to sell the copies sent me at five cents each and to secure regular weekly customers.

In order to provide me with additional cash capital this coupon also entitles me to five free copies which I will sell at five cents each (value 25 cents) and you agree also to send me a handsome Gold and Enamel Crest Pin (C. H. surrounded by laurel leaves) value, 35 cents. The total value of this coupon, sixty cents (60 cents).

I agree to use the money that I get from the sale of my first supply to order and pay for a supply of the next issue at three cents each. Unsold copies of the second and succeeding issues credited at the price paid upon return.

Questions and Answers

P. D., Dubuque, Ia. In large cities how is electricity supplied to the street cars so that it can operate those a long distance from the powerhouse as easily as those near to it?

Electric energy for cars is transmitted by conductors usually placed in cables in underground conduits, the maximum electro-motor force transmitted being about 11,000 volts. This pressure is directly generated by a steam-driven alternating current generator, and is transmitted over the conductors to sub-stations where by step-down transformers the pressure is dropped to, say 600 volts alternating current, which by rotary converters is turned into direct current for the street mains, the feeders of the railway system and for charging storage batteries, which in turn give out direct current at times of heavy demand or when otherwise required.

H. L. F., Rossburg, O. Where did Paul write the letters to the Galatians and Thessalonians? Rev. Francis E. Clark states in one of the back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that they were written at Corinth.

There is a wide difference in opinion as to the place where Galatians was written. Some hold that it was written from Rome, others from Corinth or Ephesus. Jamieson, Fausset and Brown say the evidence shows that it was written in Corinth during the winter of 57 or 58 A.D., after Paul's visit to Jerusalem recorded in Acts 15: 2. Thessalonians was also probably written in Corinth, but at an earlier date, probably between 48 and 51 A.D., when Paul had already visited and probably left Athens (see I. Thess. 3: 1.)

E. G., Berlin, Ont. Will you please suggest some way by which we can make the business meetings of our young people's society more interesting?

The greatest secret of an interesting business meeting is to have business that is really interesting. Many young people's societies languish because they do not take up enterprises that are really worth while. The spiritual note should be kept predominant. The society exists for the purposes of giving testimony to the power of Christ to save and bless the soul, of attaining spiritual culture by Bible study, prayer and Christian service, of winning others to the Master, of promoting the work of missions, and of assisting in all the enterprises of the church. The developing of enthusiastic, spiritual, practical Christians will help to solve the problem of the business meeting. But the conduct of the meeting itself is also important. The president should carefully plan the meeting in advance. Chairmen of committees should be notified to have all reports ready. It is a good idea to insist that reports be sent in two or three days in advance, so that if the chairman is unable to attend his report will be on hand. Begin the meeting on time. Appoint a special committee to provide for a social hour after the business session. Transact all business promptly, leaving social conversation and amusement till the business session has come to an end.

S. M. H., Baltimore, Md. Please explain the first five verses of the 12th chapter of the book of Ecclesiastes.

These verses have already been explained in THE MAIL-BAG. The figures of speech employed are purely Oriental. The "keepers of the house" are the limbs that protect the body; the "grinders" are the teeth which decay in age; those that "look out at the windows" are the eyes—the powers of vision; "the doors" are the lips; the "daughters of music" are the vocal organs and the voice; "the almond tree" refers to the whitening of the hair, which has a likeness to the almond tree with its white blossoms; the "grasshopper" is a type of the dried-up, shriveled human form in age; "desire shall fail" is the cessation of appetite; and the "long home" and the "mourners" typify the end of life.

E. F., Bloomfield, N. J. Please explain "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given; and whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away that which he seemeth to have" [R. V.: Thinketh he hath]. (Luke 8: 18).

This expression occurs in a number of New Testament passages, Matt. 13: 12; Mark 4: 25, etc. Its meaning is most evident in Matt. 25: 29, and Luke 19: 26, in connection with the parable of the talents, or pounds. Christ is stating in these words two laws which are universal. First, a man must have something to start with before he can do any work. Second, if he does not make good use of what is given he loses it. In other words: something never comes from nothing; neglect means loss. Every man is given something to start with for working out his life plan. If he neglects to use what he has he loses it. It cannot be said that God takes it away from him; the man simply lets it slip through his fingers. Helen Keller had very little to begin with, but she made such amazingly faithful use of that, that she gained much more. She used and developed the sense of touch till it has become almost equal to sight and hearing. But a sense or a muscle unused becomes useless. A man has only to stop walking and he will soon lose the power to walk. It is ridiculous to say that there is anything cruel about this. It is simply the law of life. And the law works no hardship to any one who has a desire to make good use of life. In the passage you mention the law is applied to hearing. When a man hears a truth he must follow it and apply it quickly. If he does not he will forget it, or cease to believe it, or lose it in some other way.

J. R. C., Fairfield, Conn. What is the difference between planets and stars?

Planets are opaque bodies which revolve around the sun as a center, in elliptical orbits nearly circular and are only visible as reflecting the sun's light. There are eight major planets, including the earth, and several hundred minor ones, with a possibility of hundreds more to be discovered, and these constitute what is called the solar system—our system. The nearest of the major planets to the sun is Mercury, 36 millions of miles distant from him, and the farthest away is Neptune, 2,791.6 millions of miles from the central luminary. The latter planet can only be seen through a strong telescope. The stars are luminous celestial bodies supposed to be the suns of other systems of worlds, and so far away are they that they are referred to as "fixed" stars, though in fact they are traveling with inconceivable rapidity around immense orbits.

J. A. M., MacLeansboro, Ill. 1. Dr. Talmage was at one time the senior editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but never its owner. 2. Whether our Lord personally baptized has been doubted. The only passage which may bear on the question is John 4: 1, 2, the explanation of which is presumed to be that John, being a servant, baptized with his own hand, while Christ as Lord and Master "baptized with the Holy Ghost," demonstrating the outward symbols through his disciples. Whether he baptized personally or not, the fact remains that, during his earthly ministry, baptism was the accepted mode of entering his service. 3. In the 7th chapter of I. Cor., Paul had apparently been asked questions by the church in Corinth which tended to disparage marriage and regard it as an undesirable state to be continued when one of the parties is an unbeliever. His long reply may be summed up in a few words: "Abide in your present station, for the time is short." The passage in I. Tim. 5: 14 is not inconsistent with the other, for the circumstances of the two cases were different, and in the latter he commends marriage under certain conditions as an antidote to certain temptations.

J. R., Saginaw, Mich. On what day of the week was June 15, 1866?

Friday.

A. C. B., Mansfield, La. 1. Please explain Ezek. 38: 1-23. 2. How long was Isaac blind? 3. Do you suppose Noah employed a great many laborers in building the Ark?

1. The verses indicate the final triumph of Messiah's rule over the distant and barbarous nations. Judea had been desolated by the heathen races and the temple defiled. Some commentators have assumed that Gog represented Lydia and Magog Syria. Others take a broader view and hold that these names refer to the confederacy of sinful nations upon which God's judgment was to be visited. (See Rev. 20: 7-9.) The whole chapter foretells the re-establishment of Israel and the final triumph of God's kingdom on earth over its enemies. 2. Isaac's blindness seems to have been due to old age and feebleness. Sight fails frequently in Eastern countries much sooner than in more temperate climates. The blessing of his sons is supposed to have preceded his death by many years—McClintock says over forty years. He died at the patriarchal age of 180. 3. There is no information on the subject in the Bible record, although it is fair to presume that he had abundant help. His own immediate descendants would hardly have been enough for such an enterprise.

F. S., Cutler, Ill. Please explain (1) Matt. 19: 10 and Matt. 21: 44. (2) Mark 2: 21, 22 and Mark 13: 14. (3) Luke 9: 62, and Luke 17: 6. (4) Rom. 9: 16.

1. It was as though the disciples had said "in this view of marriage, surely it must prove a snare rather than a blessing and had better be avoided altogether." Matt. 21: 44 has a twofold meaning. The kingdom of God is indicated as a temple, the keystone of which had been rejected by the builders, who are pictured as falling on it and receiving great hurt; but that same stone, when it should fall on them, would grind them to powder. The double reference is to the coming demolition of Jerusalem in a material sense and to the fate of the rejecters in a wider spiritual sense. 2. Mark 2: 21, 22 is designed to illustrate the difference between the old and new economies, and the result of mixing up one with the other. The "new wine" was the evangelical freedom which Christ was introducing into the old spirit of Judaism. It was as though he had said, "These inquiries about the difficulty between my disciples and the Pharisees, and even

The Science of Physics

Keeps the Parker from Leaking

TAKE a sponge out of water. The water doesn't all run out, unless you squeeze it out. A sponge is full of tiny tubes, and each holds onto its drop or two of water.

Now, there is a tiny tube leading to the pen point of a fountain pen, called the feed tube. In an ordinary fountain pen some ink is always held in the feed tube, like water in the sponge, even though the pen is placed point up in your pocket.

When your body heat—98 degrees—gets to the air in the pen, the air expands. It expands up through the inky feed tube; pushes ink up and out below the pen point; inks the writing end of pen; and inks you when you remove the cap to write.

Now, instead of a straight or blunt feed tube, as in other pens, the Parker Pen has a curved feed tube. One end touches the barrel wall. See X-ray photo. That touch starts Capillary Attraction, which pulls all ink down out of the Parker feed tube before the warm air ascends. This is the famous Parker Lucky Curve.

Thus an every-day principle of Physics, ingeniously used, keeps the Parker Pen from leaking and smearing your fingers.

14k gold pens, with hardest Iridium points, keep the Parker from scratching; Parker Spear Head Ink Controller keeps it from blotting or skipping.

Standard style Parker Pens $1.50 to $250.00, according to size and ornamentation.

John's disciples, serve to point out the effect of a natural revulsion against sudden change, which time will cure and which will be seen to be to the better advantage." Eusebius later tells us that the Christians fled to Perea to escape the predicted calamities to the nation. 3. In the first passage referred to, the meaning is obvious. There is a natural reluctance in the human heart to break with the world; but God's work demands undivided attention and complete consecration. The second passage is one in which not physical but moral obstacles to the progress of the kingdom were in the mind of the speaker, who sought to teach that no obstacle could stand before firm faith in God. 4. Mercy is God's free gift and must be so regarded, although we may desire it inwardly and make effort to secure it. Both the desire and the effort are indispensable to salvation: but in the ultimate, it is God who "out of his own good pleasure worketh in us both to will and to do." (Phil. 2: 13.)

B. M., Oshkosh, Wis. 1. Are all children born in the United States citizens thereof, irrespective of parentage? 2. If a child is born on a foreign vessel in United States waters, is it an American?

1. All except the children of persons engaged in the diplomatic service of foreign governments. 2. No; it is a citizen of the country to which the vessel belongs.

A. T. S., Plainfield, N. J. Was John the Baptist the same person as Elijah?

The statement is made a number of times in the New Testament (see Matt. 11: 14; 17: 10-12; Mark 9: 12, 13. See also Mal. 4: 5). But there is no reason for believing that this means any more than that he was the new Elijah of his time, a rugged prophet, like Elijah in temperament, habits and speech, unafraid even of kings. He himself said distinctly that he was not Elijah (John 1: 21). The sense in which the expression was used is made clear in Luke 1: 17: "He shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elijah." In the narrative of Elijah's appearance at the transfiguration there is no suggestion that he was John the Baptist, whom all the men present had known and seen, and who had only recently died. One of the things that distinguishes the philosophy of the Bible from that of uninspired teachings is that it never confuses or obscures personal identity. Each soul has a distinct personality, which can never be merged or changed into another. The theory of the transmigration of souls, to which you refer in your letter, has no place in the Christian system.

E. B., Arcola, Ill. Please explain Mark 13: 30.

This passage corresponds to Matt. 24: 32-35 and Luke 21: 29-33. Three explanations are given by commentators on these passages. (1) That the word "generation" should be interpreted in its literal sense and that it refers only to that part of the prophecy fortelling the destruction of Jerusalem. This interpretation seems forced and difficult. (2) That "generation" here means "race," a sense in which the word was often used, and that it applies to the Jewish race, which will survive until Christ's second coming. (3) That the "race" referred to is the body of believers, the spiritual Israel, which will continue until the Lord comes.

Mrs. M. H. S., Fredonia, N. Y. Where in the Bible is the statement that a contented mind is a continual feast?

Your quotation is not quite accurate. The passage is Prov. 15: 15, the last half of the verse: "He that is of a merry heart hath a continual feast."

"Anxious," Rutledge, Tenn. I am trying to live a Christian life the best I can, but I do not feel as I want to or think I ought to. When at church the pastor asks the Christians to stand, if I do so my conscience tells me I have done wrong. Sometimes I feel as though I had committed the unpardonable sin. I have come to the Lord in just as humble and contrite a way as I know, but it seems hard for me to believe he has pardoned my sins. It seems to me that I am willing and want to work for the Lord if I can only be made to feel that he accepts me as one of his children. I surely love the Lord, but it seems I cannot have peace.

Although this reader asks for a reply by letter, the inquiry is one that is upon so many lips that we are publishing what we feel to be the sure and only answer to all such troubled souls. We should like to be able to go to these distressed folks, one by one, and taking them by the hand say, as Paul said to the lame man at Lystra: "Stand upright on thy feet." They must get to work immediately at trusting Jesus. They have all the facilities and faculties for believing him, but they are not doing it. Faith is like the clutch that grips the shafting and so brings power to the machine that would otherwise stand idle. Let your faith grip God and you will feel his power coming into your troubled spirit. Of course if there is some definite wrong that you are clearly convicted of you must do what you can to make the wrong right. But the thing that brings the victory is simple faith in Jesus. It is really such an easy thing to trust Christ that we are tempted to try to find some harder thing to do. But there is nothing to do but trust him. Whatever shape your worries or doubts or anxieties take, it is possible to drop them all and trust God. He says he will receive you when you come; you must believe it. He says he will forgive all your sins; you must believe it. He says he will cleanse your heart; you must believe it. As you trust his word you will find the torments vanishing. As to the "unpardonable sin," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been glad to say at other times that those who are grieved lest they have committed it may be very sure they have not. That very grief is a sign that God is near you and is calling you to himself. You say you love God and love his church. Do not doubt any longer that you are his child.

Subscriber, South Norwalk, Conn. In New York State the legal marriage age for the man is eighteen and that for the woman is not specified. A minister has a legal right to marry a man of nineteen and a girl of sixteen, provided there is no other impediment. Ministers should use discretion, however, and take some pains to find out the standing and antecedents of the parties and the wishes of parents, etc., before uniting the applicants. The parties were not minors under New York State law.

E. H. P., Montesano, Wash. We are told to give of our abundance, according as God has prospered us, and to give gladly and freely. Many good Christians still practice tithing. We have known men who made it a cardinal principle in their business and who have been greatly blessed thereby. The trouble is that many forget to acknowledge their indebtedness to the Giver of all good, and are selfish and unprofitable servants, withholding that from the Lord's work which is its just due.

Yes, I am sure Sanatogen will help rebuild your nerves.

MULTITUDES of women—and men—look back with gratitude to the earnestly spoken suggestion that Sanatogen would help rebuild their nerves—broken down through overwork, worry or illness.

And with what satisfaction they reflect that they wisely took the well-meant, sincere advice, and by following it gradually but surely, obtained new strength for their nerves, better digestion, better sleep, improved health.

Throughout the world physicians—many of eminence—to the number of 16,000—have testified in writing to the splendid powers of

Sanatogen
THE FOOD-TONIC

These men of science found that Sanatogen's combination of purest protein and organic phosphorus gives to the nerves just the food elements they must have to restore and sustain the balance of health. They have recorded over their signatures the remarkable results they have witnessed through its use in patients with shattered nerves, impoverished blood, disturbed digestions. They bear enthusiastic testimony to the power of Sanatogen to reconstruct and revitalize a starved nervous system; to enrich the blood; to assist and promote the power of digestion and assimilation—to prepare the way for health and physical well-being.

You have this overwhelming mass of medical opinion that Sanatogen will help rebuild your nerves—as it has for thousands of other women and men.

Prof. Thomas B. Stillman, M.S., Ph.D.
The well-known research chemist of Stevens Institute, writes:

"The chemical union of the constituents of Sanatogen is a true one, representative of the highest skill in the formation of a product containing phosphorus in the organic phosphate condition, and so combined that digestion and assimilation of Sanatogen are rendered complete with the greatest ease."

The Rev. T. S. Childs, D.D.
Of Chevy Chase, writes:

"Last Spring I had a long and severe attack of grippe, the issue of which for one in his eighty-seventh year was doubtful. I resigned the charge of my church and rested. A friend, an English gentleman, called my attention to Sanatogen. I have used one small box and two large ones with marked results. In the first place there has not been the slightest ill effect. Then, whatever the cause, I find myself in such renewed health that I have accepted a call to another charge, and if one may judge for himself I am as able to preach as I have ever been in my life. I am a convert to Sanatogen."

C. H. Stockton
Rear Admiral U. S. Navy and Pres. of Geo. Washington University, writes:

"Some time ago my physician recommended Sanatogen to be used in my family. After giving it a four trial, I am thoroughly convinced it is most excellent for the nerves and an invigorating food-tonic."

John Burroughs
The distinguished naturalist and author, writes:

"I am sure I have been greatly benefited by Sanatogen. My sleep is fifty per cent better than it was one year ago, and my mind and strength are much improved."

The Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Chichester
England, writes:

"I have found Sanatogen most beneficial as well as pleasant."

His Grace the Most Rev. Archbishop of Bombay Writes:

"I use Sanatogen every now and then, under my doctor's advice, and always derive great benefit from it."

The Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Rochester England, states:

"Sanatogen has been taken by a lady staying in his house, who finds it most satisfactory, and has now been ordered it by her medical man."

Prof. C. A. Ewald
Of Berlin University. Doctor honoris causa University of Maryland, states in his contribution on "Typhus Abdominalis":

"I can say that I have used Sanatogen in a great number of cases that are, in those disturbances of metabolism which were mostly of nervous or neurasthenic origin, and have obtained excellent results."

Amelia E. Barr
The well-known authoress, writes:

"I send my sincere gratitude for the marvelous help I have derived from the use of Sanatogen. When I commenced it seven weeks ago I was in an extremity of nervous weakness brought on by long continued mental work, accentuated by the shock of a cruel fall backward. Slowly at first, but surely, it steadied and strengthened me, so that now I have almost my usual good health."

This Remarkable Book FREE

We ask you earnestly to get acquainted with Sanatogen. Investigate our claims first if you like, and we are only too glad to have you do so. Ask your doctor about it, and in any case write at once for our book, "Our Nerves of Tomorrow," written in an absorbingly interesting style, beautifully illustrated and containing facts and information of vital interest to you. This book also contains evidence of the value of Sanatogen which is as remarkable as it is conclusive.

Sanatogen is sold in three sizes—$1.00, $1.90, $3.60

Selling the first Ivory Soap—June, 1879

Ivory Soap has been before the public over thirty-three years.

During that time it has been advertised more extensively and continuously than any other article. This, in itself, proves that Ivory Soap is what its advertising claims it to be.

An article not so good as its makers claim may be advertised profitably only until its true character becomes known and the supply of new users exhausted. To make advertising pay for a term of years a product must have the merit promised by the advertisements so as to hold those who try it.

Ivory Soap advertising, from the first, has said that Ivory Soap is pure and mild; that it lathers freely and rinses easily; that it contains no "free" (uncombined) alkali; that it cleanses thoroughly but does not injure the most tender skin or the most delicate fabric; that it is the most economical soap.

Ivory Soap has always fulfilled all these claims. It is pure. It is mild. It is pleasant to use. It is economical. People who try it get what they expect and therefore continue to use it. That is why it has been advertised for thirty-three years.

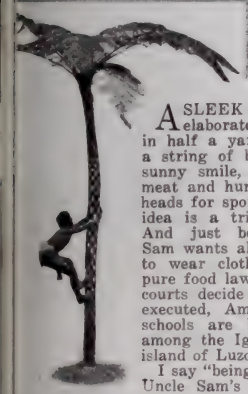
The Scholars of an American School in Luzon

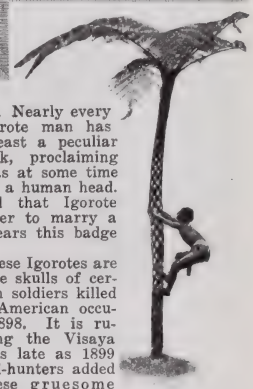
Souvenirs of War

A Scene in an Igorote Dog-Market at Baguio



SENDING THE IGOROTES TO SCHOOL

BY FREDERICK SIMPICH



A SLEEK brown man elaborately dressed in half a yard of calico, a string of beads and a sunny smile, eating dog-meat and hunting human heads for sport—well, the idea is a trifle gruesome. And just because Uncle Sam wants all his children to wear clothes, obey the pure food laws, and let his courts decide who shall be executed, American public schools are being started among the Igorotes on the island of Luzon.

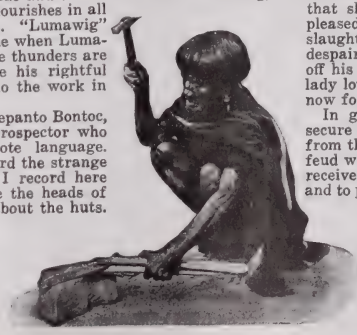
I say "being started," for Uncle Sam's teachers still have a lot of unfinished business ahead. Only in the larger towns like Baguio, the "Simla of the Philippines," where the government meets in summer, has any progress been made. For when generations of children have eaten cold dog meat for lunch, and gone garbed only in "gee-strings" and necklaces of teeth, their savage customs die hard, even under the chastening spell of an American public school. So it is that while a few now wear clothes, play baseball, and prefer a ten-dollar graphophone to the jungle call of the flaming "soldier bird," the average Igorote youth sticks to the crude spear and the wild life of the hills. Twenty miles from Baguio the real Igorote flourishes in all his pristine savagery. The superstition of ages is his. "Lumawig" is his god's name and the Igorote says earthquakes come when Lumawig gets mad and grabs the world and shakes it, for the thunders are but the angry voices of the god. Human heads are his rightful souvenirs of war, and it is mete that women should do the work in the oddly terraced rice fields of the hillsides.

An Igorote House Built on Stumps

I recall vividly my first trip to an Igorote village in Lepanto Bontoc, the barrio of Bagnen. With me was an American prospector who had picked up a working knowledge of the Igorote language. Through him and our wrinkled old guide Fu Nit, I heard the strange folk tales and superstitions of this ancient people. I record here what Fu Nit said about the custom of bringing home the heads of vanquished enemies. In every village we saw skulls about the huts. There were also many human jaw-bones used as handles on gang-sas, or gongs, beaten during the dances. This head-hunting habit seems based on the same idea that underlies the family feuds of some parts of our own land. You steal a head from my family, and I steal one from yours. The "Debt of Life" it has been styled. For generations this quest for the heads of tribal enemies has gone on among the Philippine Igorotes and among certain natives of Borneo. Nearly every adult Igorote man has on his breast a peculiar tattoo mark, proclaiming that he has at some time brought in a human head. It is said that Igorote women prefer to marry a man who bears this badge of honor.

Among these Igorotes are still kept the skulls of certain Spanish soldiers killed before the American occupation in 1898. It is rumored among the Visaya tribe that as late as 1899 Igorote head-hunters added more of these gruesome trophies to their family collections. It is believed that the spirits of beheaded enemies will become the slaves of the Igorotes in the next world. Dr. Jenks, who studied the Igorotes in 1903, was convinced that head-hunting was largely a sport—a sort of test of tribal strength, valor and agility. The Kafo Kab is the feast held to celebrate the taking of an enemy's head.

Henry Roth, in his book on Borneo, says the wild men took human heads as trophies merely to please the women. He tells of a Sakaran legend about the origin of head-hunting, as follows: A princess living near the evening star said to her lover that she would marry him if he found a present that really pleased her. He killed a large deer, and she sniffed at it. The slaughter of a giant ape also failed to please the lady. In a fit of despair the lover rushed out and slew the first man he met, cut off his head and brought it back and threw it at the feet of his lady love. To his profound surprise she smiled and said he had now found the only gift worthy of herself.



The Village Smith at Work

In going through the Igorote country it was impossible to secure packers who would accompany us more than a few miles from their own village. Each hamlet seemed to have a standing feud with those about it. Yet my companion and I were always received with warm hospitality, invited to sleep in the straw huts and to partake of food. The rice and vegetables cooked by Igorote women were appetizing enough. Roast dog we balked at, but even roasting dog smells good to a hungry man. Hundreds of dogs are brought up from the lowlands about Dagupan by Tagalog venders, and are sold to the mountain-dwelling Igorotes every year. Fat dogs are at a discount; lean meat is preferred. Fifty cents to one dollar and a half (Mexican currency) seemed the average price for a dog, depending on size. We observed in our journey through the Igorotes' land that at night all

CONVERTS' RALLY IN NEW YORK

OH, YES. Every morning I pray the Madonna to help me find the two men that were witnesses against me at my trial, so I can kill them."

Such was the answer made by a man who had served a twelve-year sentence for murder, when asked if he were a Christian. The question was asked by a worker in the recent campaign of the Evangelistic Committee of New York. Later the man became a real Christian.

This report was one of many given at the Converts' Rally held in Carnegie Hall on Monday evening, September 16, at the close of the committee's eighth summer campaign of tent, open-air and shop work. Other striking accounts were given of souls who met Christ and yielded to him, sometimes at great cost, during the season's work. People of all classes and conditions were among the committee's converts. Gangsters from the East Side, business men from Wall Street, Spanish cigarmakers, boys and girls, heard the call of the Saviour and followed.

At the rally the body of the great hall had been reserved for the recent converts and other members of the various groups of worshipers who had been gathered together by the committee's work. Red banners designated the groups. One banner read "Spanish Shops, Ten Societies"; another, "French Open Air Auxiliary"; another "Wall Street Meetings"; another, "Little Italy Tent"; and so on. A number of the boxes also bore banners representing other phases of the committee's work, particularly the auxiliary meetings in which the churches have co-operated with the committee. Other boxes and the galleries, to the topmost, were filled with interested friends of the movement.

Mr. Stephen Baker, chairman of the general committee, presided at the rally. With him on the platform were Dr. Arthur J. Smith, superintendent and director of the committee's work; Bishop Leibert, of the Moravian Church; Colonel W. A. McIntyre, of the Salvation Army; Dr. C. L. Goodell and other prominent Christian leaders, with the corps of the committee's own workers. A choir of five hundred voices, under the leadership of Mr. B. Franklin Butts, was grouped back of the speakers, and the rally was preceded by a praise service of half an hour, led by these evangelistic singers. A beautiful anthem, "Shine On, O Holy Light," opened the formal service. The audience sang "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name"; Colonel McIntyre led in prayer, and Bishop Leibert led the responsive reading of part of the forty-third chapter of Isaiah. Mr. Baker made a brief statement of the satisfactory business arrangements and management of the campaign, and Dr. Smith gave a summary of the season's work.

The Great Audience at the Converts' Rally in Carnegie Hall, New York

During the season just closed 1,922 meetings have been held at 125 centers, including 10 tent centers, 20 shop centers, 34 open-air centers, and 61 centers of auxiliary services, or meetings held by church organizations in co-operation with the committee. Altogether 414,347 persons have heard the Gospel at these meetings, which have been conducted in eleven languages.

Following Dr. Smith, a number of the leaders gave brief reports. Dr. G. A. Carstensen spoke of the open-air preaching on Wall Street; Rev. George Skrieska told of the work among the Bohemians and Slovaks; Dr. A. Perazzini told of the successful work among the Italians, a large group of whom were present, including a company of Boy Scouts. Dr. Pirazzini called attention to the fact that there are 500,000 Italians in New York, and for wor among them the committee provides only five evan gelists. He said that twenty-three young Italian were now being educated at the Bible Teachers Training School and he hoped that arrangement could be made to put some of them into the cit work. Rev. S. F. Gordiano spoke of his wor among the Spanish people of New York. He foun them chiefly about the docks and at work in th cigar factories. Rev. Julius F. Hecker gave a re port of work among the Russians; Rev. C. LeRo Butler, of work among th negroes. Mrs. Ross gave brief report of the splendi work for boys and girls i which she had acted as as sistant to Mr. Horace R Baker. At the closing rall for children's work eleve hundred boys and girls were present. Mr. Kemper G McComb spoke briefly o the efficient work done b church organizations, such as Christian Endeavors, Epworth Leagues and the Men's Brotherhoods, in co-operation with the committee. Rev. Alec Russell, known as the South Dakota "Sky Pilot," made a brief address, and after other workers had made reports, Dr. C. L. Goodell spoke, urging upon the audience the duty and privilege of supporting the committee's work. He told of finding two natives in Italy this summer who said they had been converted in New York, and one man in Switzerland, who had been converted in one of the committee's evangelistic services. "Thus," he said, "the ripples from your work are going out over all the world." Funds were needed to "follow up" the committee's summer work and prepare for the next campaign.

The choir sang the "Hallelujah Chorus," and while the collection was being taken, the old familiar hymn, "My Jesus, I Love Thee." Miss Minnie Steinmetz, a young vocalist who has assisted the committee in its summer work, sang sweetly and impressively, "Christ Will Never Fail."

At the close the Doxology was sung, first in English; then lustily by the Italian friends present; then in Slovak; then in Spanish; then in French, many of the Italians and Spanish joining; and last in English again by the great audience and the choir. Dr. Smith closed the service with prayer and the benediction.

Though their tools are few and crude, the Igorotes are clever workmen. Some of their axes, spears and shields show a wild art all their own. The pipemakers, too, turn out pipes of peculiar and graceful design. One day I watched the women working in clay and turning out kitchen utensils. Two girls carried clay from a distant pit, while older women in the village worked it up. Shapely urns and bowls are molded from the plastic clay and set in the hot sun to dry. I did not see them bake any pottery. They called these vessels fang-aas.

The Igorote villages usually consist of a small group of bamboo and thatched houses built usually as all the Malay tribes build their homes, elevated on stilts or stumps. The dignity of the owner is proclaimed by the stability of his house, the thickness of its thatch and the nature of its decoration. Pigpens in Igorote hamlets are mere holes in the ground, dug with steep sides so the pigs cannot get out. And dirty as the people are in their own habits, they are strangely careful of the pig. They wash and cook its food.

In the island of Luzon, one of the most recent estimates states, there are over two hundred thousand of these wild natives who are classed as absolutely uncivilized. They are of almost pure Malay blood, and in religion have ideas very similar to those of the North American Indians. Nature worship is the basis of what religion they have. They identify the sun with their chief god, and the moon and the stars with the spirits of departed heroes. The government efforts among these people are as yet in their infancy, for progress toward civilization in the face of the weird superstitions of these people is most disappointingly slow. Practically naked, immersed in the blackest of superstition and trained for generations to consider the most gruesome of sights and experiences a part of everyday life the Igorote is indeed a problem which only years of patient labor will solve.

In the opinion of those who have studied this tribe they are a strong, splendidly built people physically, and are mentally high among the savage races of the world. Fred W. Atkinson, the first American General Superintendent of Education in the Philippines, says of the Igorotes: "They are, as a whole, simple, honest, frank and tractable, and possessed of a sense of humor not to be observed in members of the so-called Christian tribes. The majority of the Igorotes, although so hardy and uncivilized, are anything but fierce and warlike; peaceful and self-satisfied are terms that better describe them, and the friendship between them and the Americans is tending constantly to make them more so."

Such, in outline, are the head-hunters of the Philippines whom Uncle Sam would fain see wearing a few more clothes and refraining from dog-meat luncheons and the quest of human heads.

Igorote women have a strange superstition about twins. They say that Anito, an evil spirit, is always present in one of the babes when twins are born. Napeek, twins are called, and their advent is looked on as an evil omen. Even wild buffalo—carabao—have but one calf, say the superstitious Igorotes, so they take one of the twins, usually the larger, and quietly dispose of it.

the unmarried women occupied a large hut near the center of the village. They call this institution an olag. It is a sort of social hall, where the young people of the tribe meet at night to do their courting. When an Igorote girl takes a fancy to a particular man, she will steal his spear or shield—in fact, any portable chattel—and hide it in the olag. To recover his property the young man, of course, must go in person to identify it. So all Igorotes look on the olag as the natural matrimonial bureau of the tribe. And once the Igorote man and woman are thus mated, they observe the marriage bonds as faithfully as they are kept in lands where the ceremony is not so simple.

AMERICAN COLONISTS IN MEXICO

AN AMERICAN CHURCH AND CONGREGATION IN MEXICO

THOUGH during the last two years we have so often heard of the necessity of protecting American citizens and their interests in Mexico, few outside the comparatively small rcle of these closely in touch with Mexican affairs ealized how large a proportion of these interests is a purely agricultural nature. We have long as- ociated the interests of our fellow countrymen in lexico with the mines, the ranges, and the com- erce of the country, so it comes rather as a sur- rise to learn that there are upwards of ten ousand American farmers whose landholdings in lexico total almost half a million acres. For ex- mple, upon the Atascador hacienda or plantation, tuated near Coco, in the State of Vera Cruz, are cated sixty families of Americans.

These people, who represent many different tates of the Union, are attempting to transplant eir old life, with its ideals and customs, into this ew soil. They hold church services and Sunday hool every Sunday in a thatch-covered building hich is centrally located upon the land. From dif- rent parts of the 191,000 acres that comprise the lantation the farmers and their wives, and chil- ren drive to the picturesque spot in the wilderness here the religious services are held. Among the orshipers are quite a number of devout Mexicans ho have embraced the Protestant faith. Some of ese American pioneers are men well beyond mid- le age, but they are still possessed of the spirit hat characterizes the men who brave the dangers f the wilderness to conquer its rich soil and make a safe haven for the generations who shall come fter them. The Atascador colonists not only at- end to their own spiritual welfare but the educa- ion of their own children as well as those of their lexican employees. Schools with competent teach- rs have been established in this colony as well as a number of other localities in this part of Mex- ico where American farmers have located in con- siderable numbers.

During the last few years the advent of Ameri- cans into the agricultural portions of the States of San Luis Potosi and Tamaulipas has been very large. Some of the colonies have not prospered as well as their members had hoped, but for the most part the new settlers have made a success, although they have had to put up with the hardships that accompany life on the frontier before they got a start.

In the beginning of this colonization movement the chief obstacle to the success of the farmers was the lack of an established market for the products. Since then, however, they have begun to grow vege- tables and other crops on a scale sufficiently large to enable many carload shipments to be made from one particular point, thus insuring transportation at a reasonable cost to a better market for the products of their farms. Practically all of the hun- dreds of cars of vegetables that are shipped each winter from Mexico to the United States are grown by Americans. This industry is increasing very rapidly. Every year the American people demands more and more fresh vegetables for its table during the winter months. Our doctors and our physical culturists tell us that we need these green things, especially those of us who live midst the conditions of our larger or largest cities. Our appetites crave them and the enterprise of the farmers and gardeners of our own semi-tropic States and now of Mexico place them before us at prices that, though apparently high, are in reality only a fair return upon the money invested, the labor and the risk.

The social life of these colonists is not as dreary as might be supposed, the men, women and children having various forms of amusement that are fa- miliar to us all, and while it is natural that there should be a longing on the part of the self- expatriated people for their old homes in the United States, they are for the most part a well satisfied and contented lot. So far as the men are concerned, there is no lack of diversion. The brush-covered country is filled with wild game and there are no laws to prevent hunting at will. There is a never ending number of new things to be learned in connection with life in these colonies, and the daily round of work and pleasure prevents homesickness and monotony getting a hold upon the new settlers.

During the days of the Madero revolution there was no lack of diversion of a rather unpleasant nature, for the American colonists were never sure when their property might fall a prey to either the army of Diaz or of Madero. Ever since Presi- dent Madero has had his government established upon a good working basis there have been times when great uneasiness was felt by the colonists. Bands of outlaws, such as may always be found in a country which has recently been torn by war, are moving up and down and at times have actually gathered in sufficient numbers to be termed, in some of the press despatches, revolutionary armies in- stead of mere outlaws. The most recent reports, however, hold out the greatest encouragement for the American settlers in the neighboring republic. The disturbing reports which, only a few weeks ago, led President Taft to a serious consideration of intervention in Mexico have now proved to have been grossly exaggerated. Orozco, around whom the malcontents have been gathering as a leader, has been handicapped in his operations and com- pelled to seek peace by the capture of his father, who was on the Texas side of the Mexican border attempting to arrange shipments of arms and am- munition to his son's outlaws, who masquerade un- der the title of the revolutionary army of Mexico.

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—THE STATUE OF LIBERTY, which the American Government ill erect in Manila, has been completed by the well-known wiss sculptor, Kissling, whose design was chosen in an inter- ational competition. The statue, which will cost $58,000 when elivered in Manila, is a grandiose work in bronze, consisting f a series of life-size figures dominated by the Philippine na- ional hero, José Rizal. The monument, after inspection by an merican commission, was shipped from Geneva and is now on s way to Manila.

—THE HUNGARIAN PARLIAMENT, which began its session on eptember 17, was the scene of a free fight between police and eputies. The violence was unprecedented, and the din of rumpets, motor horns, and cowbells continued all day long. ount Stephen Tisza, president of the Lower House, who was ered from the moment he entered the Chamber, surrendered he chair at 3 o'clock to Vice-President Beothy, but the uproar id not abate. At 4 o'clock a strong force of police entered the uilding. All attempts to induce them to depart peaceably ailed. The police advanced to expel them, and a terrific strug- le ensued, in which fists were used freely. After a prolonged truggle, only Count Apponyi and fourteen Deputies were left. he count told the police commandant that they would depart oluntarily if the police went first. This was done, and the overnment Deputies returned to the Chamber.

—A RECENT DESPATCH FROM Paris states that the terms for eace between Italy and Turkey have been practically arranged, vith the exception of a proposed loan to Turkey of between 100,000,000 and $120,000,000, concerning which Italy is now ommunicating with French, English and Belgian financiers. he terms of the proposed settlement include, the despatch tates, the tacit acceptance by the Porte that the Italian occu- ation of Tripoli is an accomplished fact, Turkey being per- itted to retain a Mediterranean port at one of the extremities f Libya, with a strip of territory allowing communication with he Arabs in the interior. Provision is also made for the recog- ition of the spiritual suzerainty of the Sultan in Tripolitania, for the payment of monetary grants to the Arab chiefs by Italy, which also will pay to Turkey annually a certain amount of the national debt, the payment being guaranteed by revenues de- rived from Libya, and for the cession to Turkey of some terri- tory as compensation for the loss of Tripoli.

—SIDNA ALLEN AND WESLEY EDWARDS, the last two members of the notorious Allen clan which startled the entire country last March by "shooting up" the courthouse at Hillsville, Va., killing Judge Massie outright and fatally wounding several others, were apprehended a couple of weeks ago at Des Moines, Ia., where they were evading pursuit under assumed names. The love of a girl for one of them led to the arrest of both. Miss Maude Iroler, of Mount Airy, N. C., innocently led the detectives to the lair of the fugitives. She is the sweetheart of Wesley Edwards, and about a month ago the latter came to North Carolina to spend an evening. On that occasion a letter was dropped which gave the authorities the clue to the where- abouts of the missing men. Miss Iroler was watched and was on her way to marry Edwards when followed by the detectives.

—ON THE NIGHT of September 14 Harry Horowitz, or "Gyp the Blood," as he is known to the police and his intimates, and Louis Rosenzweig, who is known as "Lefty Louie," the last of the four gunmen wanted by the police in connection with the now famous Rosenthal murder in New York, were locked up in police headquarters. They were arrested in a flat in the Glendale section of Queens County just over the Brooklyn city line. They had been hiding there for almost the entire two months which elapsed between the murder and their capture. The taking of these two men comes as the result of weeks of unremitting activity on the part of the Detective Bureau of the New York Police Department. A section of the country, taking in every town within two hours' railway journey of New York City, has been carefully and thoroughly searched. The relatives of the accused men were watched and followed by day and their homes guarded by night. It was hoped that by fol- lowing the wives of Rosenzweig and Horowitz the capture might be effected. Though these young women have been going freely about New York, at times using an automobile, such care have they exercised that the detectives who followed their movements and attempted to trace the machine were entirely thrown off the track. The police had secured a number of clues and fol- lowed each only to find it useless until they learned that the two men were in hiding in a house whose rear windows over- looked an open air moving picture show. Then came the in- formation that the house also contained a laundry. This nar- rowed the search until finally the right place was found.

—TWELVE YOUNG NAVAL apprentices from the United States Naval Training Station at Lake Bluff, Ill., were drowned in Lake Michigan on the afternoon of September 15 when the recreation cutter attached to the station was swamped on a sandbar close to shore. The party, in which were twenty-four apprentices, left the training station about two o'clock in charge of Chief Gunner's Mate William Negus, and after cruis- ing about for two hours headed for North Chicago. A few minutes later, while the cutter was north of Lake Forest, a squall struck the boat, the sails were lowered and an anchor was thrown out, but the waves soon were running so high that the boat dragged its anchor and gradually was being driven on to the beach. When within two hundred feet of the shore, it overturned, and its occupants were thrown into the water. Captain W. F. Fullam, commandant of the naval training sta- tion, saw the danger of the apprentices from his headquarters and sent a motor boat to the rescue, but this craft also was capsized before it had gone far and the men in charge of it were obliged to swim back to the shore. All but one of the young men could swim, but as many were badly affected by seasickness they were unable to do their best. The non-commissioned offi- cer in charge took the one boy who could not swim and tried to get him ashore, but the waves, driven by a forty-five-mile gale, tore the youth from his rescuer's grasp. All the appren- tices in the cutter were from the Middle Western States and ranged between eighteen and twenty-three years of age.

HOW TO KEEP YOUNG

A SERMON

BY

Rev. Wallace MacMullen, D.D.*

TEXT: "A well of water springing up into eternal life." John 4: 14

THIS is a promise by Christ of the kind of life which is quite independent of any accidents of time or place, a life which finds its satisfaction and supplies within and is always young. This topic, how to keep young, does not imply that age is an unmitigated curse and youth an unmixed blessing. Age has its treasures and no sane soul would dream of exchanging those treasures for the tempting things of youth.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, who wrote many poems on old age which were full of cheer and pathos, has one called "Nearing the Snow-Line." In it he reminds us that we must leave the bright enameled zones below, and, as we climb, the flowers get few and slender and their stems are ice-coated. Yet the snow-line of life introduces one to a white realm of peace. It has majestic altars and from them there rises no smoke of vain desire, and the eternal stars shine on that realm and all the unclouded blue of heaven belongs to it. When the heart covets youth and coaxes it to be its constant companion, its longing does not mean that it regards age as a shivering pauper stripped by envious time of all warm raiment and desirable property. It does not mean a proposal to relinquish any of the rare prizes which have been won on the hard battle fields of experience. It does not want youth's immaturity and folly and vanity but its liberty and delight and inexhaustible vigor.

God's Thought Forever Young

So far as these treasures are physical in their cause we must be content to part with them. A strong body in perfect repair, defying the years, may be a heavy contributor to the youth of the soul. But it may not be. Many a sturdy frame has been the home of an old and withered soul. And many a frail frame, pain-racked, has made a cage for a soul that sings. The problem is not a physical one. We may, perhaps, by a proper observance of the laws of health, lengthen out the years and preserve the vigor of this fleshly tabernacle, but our powers in that realm are exceedingly limited. As Brierly says, "The heart is a laborer to whom we pay no wages, with whom we hold no conversation, who gets his orders elsewhere, who elects to work and at the end to cease to work without any say of ours in the matter. And so of the other organs. In some mysterious way they run the machine. Some one has wound them up to go for a certain time. When their energies slacken we feel it, but we cannot alter the situation. The body ages, as a plant or planet ages, by a rhythmic immutable process." The problem of keeping young is spiritual. There are characteristics of youth which we rightly prize and may properly covet; tempers which we should try to keep if we have them or create if we have not.

One of the marked things about youth is its ability to walk in the living present. One of the tendencies of age is to live in the past. Perhaps, alas, the vanished years are a heavy burden; they have vexed the soul and bruised it and seriously crippled it. Perhaps they are full of the haunting specters of sins which the soul would gladly blot from its remembrance, but cannot. Perhaps they are full of invitations to reminiscence sad but sweet, because they held treasures which have been snatched away from us by cruel time. For whatever reason, whether attractive or repulsive, the past to those who are old bulks large and the soul looks back with regret upon sins or losses, or wanders with dreamy delight through the experiences of long ago. It is not to condemn the tendency that we mention it, for memory is the basis of the continuity of life, but to contrast it with youth, which has no past to weight its wings or clog its feet. Youth lives in the present. Again, burdened maturity is apt to dwell in the future. When the fight is on and the loads are heavy and the soul is anxious and weary and its breath comes quick and panting, it is natural, partly because of its weariness, partly because of its vigor and the hope which is one of its elements, for that soul to look into the future and revel in the prospects of release from toil, and the coming of ease and success. But the habit of youth is to be occupied not with yesterday nor with to-morrow, but with to-day. "Now" is its accepted time. And this must be a valuable ingredient in any prescription which aims to bring to the soul perennial youth. Keep interested in to-day, alive to the present. "Every day is the best day in life." If the former times were better than these, still these are different. Be alert to the novelties. Life is not stale, it is fresh. It is not dull, it glows.

> I find earth not gray, but rosy,
> Heaven not grim, but fair of hue;
> Do I stoop? I pluck a posy;
> Do I stop and stare? All's blue.

The poor bored creatures, tired and cynical, to whom everything is flat and unprofitable, who need to travel and toil to get new sensations, are pitiable; old before half-grown; decrepit spirits blaming the times in which they live for their hopeless decrepitude.

Cultivate the habit of an eager expectancy toward to-day. Maintain that attitude toward nature. In God's out-of-doors there is nothing old—everything is new. "God renews his ancient rapture" in every fragrant flower and every flaming sunset. "What a great thought was that of God, when he thought a tree!" said Ruskin. So great that God himself was delighted with it and repeats it daily. "The hour of glory in the grass, of splendor in the flower" is not past when the early years of life are over. God paints new flowers and cuts new leaves and lays new carpets of green and new robes of ermine and builds new forests and weaves new clouds all the time, flinging out new glories from the inexhaustible storehouses of his power, and is pleased if we are polite enough to keep up an interest in his splendid handiwork and keep our souls receptive. Said Sir Arthur Helps, "What! dull, when you do not know what gives its loveliness of form to the lily, its depth of color to the violet, its fragrance to the rose? when you do not know in what consists the venom of the adder any more than you can imitate the glad movements of the dove? What! dull, when earth, air and water are all alike mysteries to you and when as you stretch out your hand you do not touch anything the properties of which you have mastered? while all the time nature is inviting you to talk earnestly with her, to understand her, to subdue her and to be blessed by her? Go away, man; learn something, understand something, and let me hear no more of your dulness." And keep interested in men. They have not lost value. Every soul is a problem, tormenting or exhilarating, and no two are alike.

The Temper of Youth in the Soul

Keep the dimness of age out of the eyes of the spirit when you look upon your fellows. Maintain a hospitable attitude toward them. Give them entrance to your interest and sympathy. There is that in them which is worth welcoming. They are not mere breathing creatures against whom you jostle as you walk through life, they are not mere conveniences helping you to get your work done. They are thrilling with high hopes, sad with unmet needs, palpitating with power, fellow runners with you in the swift race toward the immortal years, fascinating to God. Be expectant as you face them. Never lose interest in existing things, in nature or life, in current history, in to-day's truths. When John Wesley was eighty-seven, decayed in every part of his frame, eyes dim, hands trembling, he sat for his picture, he studied Lincoln Cathedral and compared it with Yorkminster, he noted the characteristics of the Lincoln people, he corrected bad practices in the churches he visited, young until at last the windows were curtained and the old heart refused to beat and he went home. To be always expectant, always receptive, always responsive will help the soul to keep its youth.

And then the young are care-free. They have a simple trust which is perhaps not a specimen of the finest faith, but is nevertheless beautiful. It is an attitude born of experience. They have been cared for and have gotten the habit of expecting the care. They do not study their needs, analyze and measure them and reach conclusions as to how to meet them. They know their needs only in the haziest way, but are content. Theirs is an unreasoning, untroubled dependence. When Francis of Assisi was starting on one of his journeys he came upon a flock of birds and he preached to them: "Little birds, you are much beholden toward God, your Creator, and should never fail to praise him in every place. You should thank him for the warm covering, for the air which he has given you to live in, that you, neither reaping nor sowing, are fed by him; that he has given you the mountains and valleys for refuge and the high trees to build your nests in, and the rivers and fountains to drink in. Wherefore, little sister birds, because God loves you so much you must beware of the sin of ingratitude and forget not to praise him." The attitude of the young is like that of the birds. They are cared for and are contented. And that is part of the youthful temper which souls should cultivate. Worry and fret are the enemies of youth. They interfere with physical processes, to say nothing of spiritual ones. They clog the circulation, impair digestion, interfere with heart action, disintegrate nerve filaments and plow furrows in the face. And they make the soul old and timid and irritable, break its peace into fragments, quench the light of its hope and the fire of its love. Get the child temper and keep it. "He careth for you." Don't fret.

Youth's Treasures, Our Immortal Hope

And youth's outlook is an interesting thing. The ability of the young to make much of the present is partly because of their boundless future. There are no limitations in sight. They don't worry about the future, because there is so much of it. They have not learned to economize time, because they have such princely possessions in that particular commodity. Now, we are commending not their extravagant habits, but their inspiring outlook. If they thought their days were few they could not so heartily welcome to-day. Because their future is illimitable their present is full of glory. Do we not see how the truth of our immortality gives a sense of leisure and radiant delight in the passing hours? This truth really grasped will bring zest into toil and confidence into plan. We may indulge in long purposes because we have eternal length of days. The earth experience, however lengthened out, is our infancy. We will grow up some day and become mature in the far-away reaches of eternity. The prospects are illimitable.

But the immortality of our hope means not a long process of growing old, but immortal youth. There is no old age over there. There is nothing to wear out. The wisdom of the mature joined to the vision and vigor of the young, and death dead. If our belief in our immortality rules us as a master does a slave, then the eternal life will make us feel the thrill of its youth now and here.

We cannot think of youth's treasures without urging its vigor. And vigor means toil. Young life which is normal is in love with the idea of a task. Nothing is surer to promote age and decay than the lack of vital interest in the needs and problems of the world. Inaction is not only a sign of death, it is a cause of death. Said Martin Luther, "The human heart is like the millstone in the mill; when you put your wheat under it, it turns and grinds and bruises the wheat into flour; if you put no wheat it still grinds on and grinds itself away." The rich young man who is not obliged to work is sadly handicapped; he has a threat aimed at his soul by his condition in life. And if he elects not to work he invokes a curse upon himself. But if he is honorable, high-souled, with lofty ideals, is there a career open to him? Political life is not decent enough to appeal strongly. He does not care for the prospect of surrendering himself and becoming the servant of a cheap boss. Commercial life is not too savory. Current revelations of ideals now in vogue and practices now common make it rather repellant to a self-respecting, clean soul. And yet there has never been a time for many a year when there was a better chance in politics for an independent, brave, eager man than now. Recent upheavals, the cheering example of some splendid leaders, these things call to the men of leisure, brains and conscience to give themselves to the task of the ethical reconstruction of our political life. And the same opportunity and appeal come

PEACE

NEVER a sigh through the livelong day,
Never a sigh;
But a laughing face, and a cup of joy
As the hours flew by.
But where were the peace that follows grief
When the morrow's light has brought relief,
If never a sigh?

Never a task through the livelong day,
Never a task;
And for kindly rest by labor won,
No need to ask.
But where were the peace, when, work all done,
We sit and rest at set of sun,
If never a task?

Never to part through the livelong day,
Never to part;
But to walk together in weal and woe
With gladsome heart.
But where were the peace that follows pain
When several souls have met again,
If never to part?

Never a prayer through the livelong day,
Never a prayer;
But all things granted, and all things won,
And a truce to care.
But where were the peace that comes from heaven
With blessings sought and daily given,
If never a prayer?

Never a cross through the livelong day,
Never a cross;
But all things right that are now most wrong;
All gain, no loss.
But where were the peace our days might hold
With heaven's love ours, when earth-love grows cold,
If never a cross?

How to Keep Young

from the financial world. There is a new chance and a new need for all men of honor to stand uncompromisingly for righteousness in our commercial life, and there is a new and more bracing atmosphere for such men to breathe. And never were the opportunities for Christian toil more inspiring. In the old empires of the East, where the new life is throbbing; in the heavy tasks which confront the church in the great cities everywhere where men live in sin and die without God, there are awful needs sending out clarion calls for consecrated men. Save your life by giving it away. Keep young by doing something. Get interested in human lives. "Hitch your wagon to a star"; and that means, if it means anything practical, link your soul to this star on which you dwell. Give yourself to its need. Get absorbed in its destiny. Push with all your power to help its progress. Get in love with God's purpose for it. Be conquered by Christ's passion and sacrifice for it.

To be receptive, responsive and trustful; to have vision, vigor, love, God, are not these the guarantees of youth in this mortal life? There are multitudes of white-haired saints with jubilant young souls who can testify that the prescription is reliable. And

As the banks fade dimmer away,
As the stars come out, and the night-wind
Brings up the stream
Murmurs and scents of their infinite sea, may we cross with quiet hearts and radiant faith to the other shore, where we shall see the King in his beauty, and dwell with him, and be forever young!

EFFORTS AND RESULTS

DISCOURAGEMENT comes less from the difficulty of a task or the heaviness of a burden than it does from the failure of those for whom the work is done to appreciate earnest effort. "What is the use of trying when I get no credit for it?" exclaims one who has striven faithfully with a hard duty but has not yet met the demand of the world for results.

Everywhere in business, in public life, and even in church work that stern rule is applied. "Can you produce the goods?" the employer asks the applicant. Visible, tangible proof of value is required when an attractive proposition is offered. "Show me," is the business man's slogan. When substantial, well-authenticated results have been presented to the world, then the world responds with that praise so eagerly fought for, "He has made good." Never mind how faithful the effort, never mind how stupendous the difficulties, a calculating world seldom rewards with a verdict of "well done" the man who has failed to produce something to add to the statistical wealth or efficiency of his day.

Now and then there are exceptions. Now and then persons of insight or vision are able to see deeper than the externals and beyond the results. It is easy to appraise a man's product; it is more difficult to place a correct valuation upon his effort. Yet there are sensitive souls who instinctively, or by an acquired gift of grace, recognize the motive and the effort as the real thing of value and the result as secondary in importance.

IN FLORENCE, Italy, is a manufactory for hand-made lace. It was founded and endowed by Robert Barrett Browning as a memorial to his father and mother. Hundreds of women in the villages scattered about Florence bring their work to this Browning Memorial. Most of it is very beautiful, for the workers are paid not for the quantity but for the quality of their lace. The rare and costly pieces are eagerly bought by those who delight in such things, and can afford them.

One day a poor woman more than eighty years old came to the Browning Memorial to sell her lace. Her husband had been drowned at sea, her sons had been killed in war, and alone in her old age she was struggling to care for two grandchildren. She brought an elaborate piece of lace upon which she had worked steadily for three months, but her eyes were failing and her fingers unsteady, and the lace was crude and uneven.

"What shall we do with it?" asked the superintendent, showing the lace to Mr. Browning. "It is worthless, but I dread sending the poor old woman away."

"Pay her for it, and give it to me," said Mr. Browning. "She has done the best she could."

So for several years, the old woman came, each three months, hobbling on her cane and bringing her lace, and with comfort and gladness in her heart she went hobbling away again carrying her silver tied in the corner of her handkerchief.

BUSY in his study a minister was preparing his sermon for the coming Sabbath. He reached to the shelf at his side for a book, and then remembered that he had left it down stairs. His little daughter was playing in the next room and he called her. She came, running, eager and delighted at the thought that papa needed her. He explained carefully where she could find the book and she went gladly, returning in a moment with a book which he saw at a glance was the wrong one. But he hardly looked at the book as he took it and laid it on his table. He looked only at the eager face of his little daughter, wreathed in smiles. Gathering her close to his heart he kissed her and said, "Thank you, darling," and when she had gone back happy and contented to her play, he went quietly for the book he needed. I think I should like to listen to the sermons that man would preach. I think they would deal little with dogmas and theories and much with life, and human hearts, and the tenderness of God the Father in his dealings with his faulty, stumbling children.

THE relentless demand of the world for results is a good thing. So often we are tempted to exaggerate our efforts and think we have done our best when we have not really developed half our latent powers. Much of our energy and much of our ability would remain dormant if we were not fairly compelled by the prodding of the world to stir them into life and action.

Any results short of those possible to us by the full employment of all our talents, by the full development of all our potentialities, must merit rebuke. We cannot know when we have reached our utmost. As long as further effort is possible, further achievement also is possible. Many a battle has been won after it seemed that defeat was inevitable. The inflow of new strength, the flash of a new idea, the impulse of a new inspiration or revelation, all are useless to one who has quit the struggle and accepted defeat.

Only when we have continued to the end, doing our utmost and doing our best, may we be comforted by the knowledge that it is the effort and not the results which will win the reward. Then we may go confidently into the presence of the Master of the works and present the lace which we have made with so intricate a pattern and so much labor. There will be many faults, many uneven, and unbroken, and tangled threads, but through it all, if we have been faithful, the Master will be able to trace the design, and he will look it over without reproach, saying, "Pay her for it, and give it to me. She has done the best she could."

MY BIBLE AND I

WE'VE traveled together, my Bible and I,
In all kinds of weather, with smile or with sigh,
In sunshine or sorrow, in tempest or calm,
Thy friendship's unchanging, my lamp and my Psalm.

We've traveled together, my Bible and I,
When life has grown weary, and death e'en was nigh;
But all through the darkness of mist and of wrong,
I found thus a solace, a prayer, and a song.

So now who shall part us, my Bible and I?
Shall ism? or schism? or "new lights" who try?
Shall shadow for substance or stone for good bread
Supplant thy sound wisdom, give folly instead?

Ah, no, my dear Bible. Revealer of Light,
Thou Sword of the Spirit, put error to flight;
And still through life's journey, until the last sigh,
We'll travel together, my Bible and I.

A "Hoosier Poet" Story

THIS story, which will undoubtedly prove new to many of our readers, has been sent us as a personal reminiscence by Mr. D. R. Emmons, of North Lewisburg, Ohio. He tells how one day many years ago General Don Piatt, who occupied a splendid castle in the Macochuk Valley, in imitation of the feudal life of the Middle Ages, was riding his famous horse "Golddust" through the streets of one of the neighboring villages, when he encountered the local constable in the act of gathering in a rather seedy-looking individual, who appeared to be terribly ill. Reining up, he asked, "What are you going to do with that man?"

"Lock him up, of course," replied the constable. "Oh, I wouldn't do that," said the general, only to have the constable, who was none too pleased at being thus questioned, remark, "Well, we can't have him around here."

"You better let me take care of him then," the general said, and in a short time a carriage was brought and the man who had so narrowly escaped arrest as a vagrant was taken to the general's home and carefully provided for.

He was so dreadfully ill that several days elapsed before he made his appearance downstairs. Then Don, as he was familiarly called, said, "Well, old fellow, I have been trying to take care of you for several days and I would like to know who you are and where you are from."

"My name is Riley," was the reply, "and I am a sign-painter from Indiana."

"What! you can't be James Whitcomb, who writes verse?"

"That's what they call me at home," was the reply.

Don Piatt kept the now famous Hoosier poet as a guest in his home for several months. One morning in the fall, as they were walking up a neighboring road, Riley, now in the pink of condition, took a spurt, vaulted a fence into a cornfield where the drying stalks were piled up in great sheaves, and, producing pencil and paper, sat down on a log to write. The general walked some distance, then returned and sat by the poet on the log. Riley at last finished his work and tossed into the general's lap a sheet of paper. It was the first manuscript of the well-known poem, "When the Frost Is on the Pumpkin and the Fodder's in the Shock." General Piatt superintended the publication of this poem, and as long as he lived he and the now aged poet remained the firmest of friends.

MORE THAN PLEASED WITH TWILIGHT TALES

The book, Twilight Tales, came to me safely. I am more than pleased. It is good, very good. Thanks for it. With best wishes,

FORTY YEARS AMONG THE AMERICAN HIGHLANDERS

IF FORTY years' experience among the Highlanders gives authority to speak of them, then I may be granted that privilege. For more than forty years I have traveled among them as soldier, physician and minister. I was brought up in a village of churches, and thought all people this side of China were equally blessed. Some older people are yet laboring under this same delusion. When a young man I went to Virginia, the land of my fathers, to join the army, and rode more than a hundred miles across the Cumberland Mountains. Although not looking for churches nor preachers, I do not remember seeing a single one. During the war I crossed those mountains several times, and still found no churches. I was surprised.

After the war I became a physician, and frequently rode through those mountains, visiting the sick, and still found only a church or two in many miles, though there were thousands of people with souls. When I became a minister, I naturally remembered that country, where many of my old comrades lived, Christless and churchless, and determined to take them what little help I was able to give.

In the Synod of Kentucky I found a mighty champion of these long-neglected people, the Rev. Dr. Stuart Robinson, a man who believed the Gospel was for "every creature" in "all the world." Through his influence largely, the mission to the mountains was inaugurated by the Synod of Kentucky over twenty years ago, and I was honored by being called from the First Church in Louisville to serve the Synod as an evangelist. I thought I had some idea of the vast destitutions of the mountain regions, but when I entered the work I was amazed to find a region as large as the German Empire practically without churches, Sabbath schools, or qualified teachers; whole counties with tens of thousands of people who had never seen a church, or heard a Gospel sermon they could understand; and there are thousands of them yet.

This vast Appalachian region covers some eighty-six thousand square miles, and is inhabited by some four millions of people, nearly all white, and they are to-day the purest stock of Scotch-Irish and Anglo-Saxon races on the continent. For hundreds of years they have lived isolated from the outside world, with no foreign intermixture. I do not remember ever seeing a foreigner in the Cumberland Mountains.

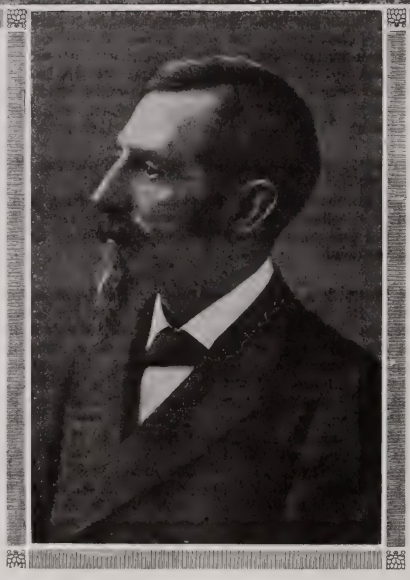
They are not a degenerate people. They are a brave, independent, high-spirited people, whose poverty and location have isolated them from the advantages of education and religion. They have been simply passed by in the march of progress in this great age, because they were out of the way. The world to-day, even our own people, knows more of China and Japan than of these neighbors, our contemporaries of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

No railroads or any other kind of roads invited travelers, scholars or preachers into the solitudes of their mountain homes. The inevitable result has been the want of those blessings which education and religion bring—churches and schools. With the fewest exceptions, there are none of either. In the largest county in the Cumberlands, when I entered it, there was not a church in the whole county, and the only school in its capital was taught in the courthouse. One of our oldest evangelists, a mountain man, after a tour through a large section, said: "Of all the destitutions I have ever seen this excels all. Not a Bible nor a Christian did we find."

I have no hesitation in saying that this is the largest body of white people on this continent who are practically without the Gospel, and I do not know any people who will make greater sacrifices to hear it. I have known them to walk from five to ten miles over their rough mountain roads to hear the Gospel, and sit on the ground and rough boards from nine A.M. till four P.M. with only a brief intermission at noon. Though without education they are naturally very bright and easily comprehend and gladly receive the Gospel message; and when converted are as faithful as any others under similar conditions. To their honor be it said, I have never seen an infidel among them.

We believe in foreign missions, but we also believe in "beginning at Jerusalem." These are the "heathen at our doors." Their souls are worth as much as others. They are more easily reached. It costs less than half to reach them. The results are quicker because their language is our own. Their traditions, history and ancestors are the same as our own. The consequences of their conversion are greater. They will furnish the teachers, ministers, and missionaries to the heathen abroad.

A Typical Sunday School Among the Highlanders of Kentucky



Dr. Edward O. Guerrant

President, American Inland Mission

After forty years' knowledge of this people and twenty-five years' labor among them as a minister, I was convinced that all agencies now employed or available by neighboring churches would never reach them in this generation, or maybe in a dozen generations. So I appealed to all other Christian people who loved their poor countrymen to help save them.

The response was such as only God could inspire. From every branch of the church and every section of our country, and beyond it, even from China and the Sandwich Islands, God has raised up loving hearts and liberal hands to help.

In ten years 362 missionaries have labored exclusively in these wild mountains. They made 51,000 visits; held over 22,000 public services at 10,069 places; had 6,304 conversions; taught 879 Bible schools with 39,456 pupils; distributed over 250 boxes and barrels of clothing to the poor, over 10,000 Bibles and Testaments, and 125,000 tracts; built 56 churches, school and mission houses, including three colleges and an orphan asylum.

No man with a heart could ride through those wild mountains and behold the almost universal destitution of everything necessary to human life and happiness without pity and compassion. He certainly would not have the heart Jesus, who "had compassion on the multitude scattered abroad as sheep having shepherd." These people belong to the ruling race of the world and are worthy to belong to it. They certainly should have an equal chance for the blessings of religion and education with the Asiatics and Africans. They have not had it in the past. For our missions are big houses yet, on the shores of a continent dar ess.

Among those who have responded to our call for help are two noble women in Ohio, who sent money to open a new mission in Breathitt Count on the new railroa from Jackson to th head of the Kentuck River, where such mission is sadl needed. It will co sist of a nice chap and a residence fo the teachers. Th people are enthus astic over the pro pect of such a bles ing and will give a the help they a able. They will fu nish land, lumbe and labor, and lo of fine children to b trained for God an their country. God blessing and his poo children's gratitud will amply rewar these two goo women.

Highland Colleg conducted by the "Inland Mission," continues to re ceive many tokens of the Father's blessing. Th new term began on July 22 with the largest attenc ance yet. Some generous friends of our Maste and his poor children have furnished the means t build a forty-foot wing of two stories to the colleg which is now going up. This is the "Breckenridg Hall." God will reward those who made this wor possible.

Sunday, the 21st, was a big day at the colleg Crowds came early and brought their dinner an spent the day, and a lovely day it was. At nin A.M. the Sabbath school opened with a full attend ance. At ten A.M. the large chapel was crowde and Dr. Guerrant preached, and seven person came forward to confess Christ and unite with th church, and six received baptism. At two P.M there was a sacred concert led by Mrs. Flowers Rev. Mr. Anderson of Louisville, Miss France Breckenridge Steele of Midway, assisted by fou young ladies who came up with her, and some o our Soul Winners from other missions and local tal ent. At three P.M. Rev. Elias Moore, a High lander, raised in a neighboring county, recentl pastor of a church in Oregon, preached an eloquen sermon, aptly illustrated by incidents of his travel in the Holy Land. At night Rev. Mr. Anderso preached an excellent sermon to a good congrega tion, who came through the rain and darkness Behold what God hath wrought in five years fron a little school of five pupils, under a sycamore tree where there was no church, or preacher, or school house, or Sunday school!

On Monday evening of the opening of the High land College, Rev. Dr. Hawes of Louisville and Mr Collins, an elder in the First Church, came up t see and help. The doctor preached that night and twice on Tuesday, and delivered a humorous lecture to the college students. The Highlanders, whose life is a tragedy rather than a comedy, and who sel dom have occasion to laugh, greatly enjoyed the doctor's lecture, and for an hour and a half they ceased to be serious and sober, and laughed until they were tired, tired from laughing, not of listening. They will never forget the doctor.

God wisely ordered it through Professor and Mrs. Wells that Dr. Bach, of Jackson, with Miss Braden, a trained nurse from Lexington, should hold a clinic at the college on Monday and Tuesday Scores of the lame and halt and blind came to this free clinic. Dr. Hawes saw it, and was so deeply impressed with the want of medical and surgical help for these poor people that he returned to Louisville and laid the matter before his splendid church and raised money enough to build a nice hospital at the college. We have no words to express our gratitude to him and them. Nor have the Highlanders, but God is able to reward them gloriously when he comes to make up his jewels.

The hospital will be built at once, and the good doctor intimated that they might support a trained nurse there. "Our cup runneth over."

EDWARD O. GUERRANT.

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

NOTHING has been said as yet about rewards for our best Bible students. All the records are being kept, and some names are noticeable as occurring in the Honor Roll month after month. There was one list near the beginning of the series to which no one sent a perfect set of answers, so there will be no one who has answered every question of every list correctly. But some have done remarkably faithful and successful work, and when the series ends those who stand near the head of the year's Honor Roll will receive suitable rewards.

Of all the letters received in the Bible question correspondence, this one has brought more gratification and encouragement to the editors than any other: "In hunting for the answers I read the entire book of Romans, several chapters of Revelation and considerable of other portions of the Bible." This is the sort of Bible reading that counts—a whole book at a time. And when people get in the habit of reading the Bible that way, not a verse or a chapter here and there, but by the book, they will begin to grasp the real message of the Scriptures. It is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S earnest hope that the study of these Bible questions will produce multitudes of Bible experts, people who do really know the Bible.

We have thought a number of times that we had located our oldest pupil, but we find this week that some one has this distinction who had not told us his age before. He is Mr. Asa E. Halbert, of Glean, N. Y., ninety-six years old! We can see the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Class rising in a body to give him the Chautauqua salute. We hope that he, too, can see them in imagination, as we do while we write. His name is on the Honor Roll, and will be written down, we know, not only in the printed Honor Roll, but in the hearts of our readers.

By the way, are you saving the lists of questions, with their answers? They will make a valuable scrapbook of Scripture knowledge.

Here is the Honor Roll for List No. 8:

The following 62 answered all 12 questions:

Miss J. H. Archibald, John Bissett, Maria P. Berry, Sarah F. Bartlett, Mrs. O. C. Barnes, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. E. Camp, Mrs. E. E. Cammack and daughter, Mrs. Jennie A. Clapp, Ora M. Answers, List No. 8

1. On what occasion did four men sit upon the ground seven days and seven nights? Ans. When Job's three friends came to visit him. Job 2: 13.

2. What king was allowed to choose one of three punishments for his transgressions? Ans. David. II. Sam. 24: 12.

3. What is the first Bible reference to a hypocrite? Ans. Job 8: 13.

4. What prophet was suspended between earth and heaven by his hair? Ans. Ezekiel. Ezek. 8: 3.

5. What births recorded in the Scriptures were announced by angels? Ans. Ishmael, Gen. 16: 10, 11; Isaac, Gen. 18: 10; Samson, Judges 13: 3; John the Baptist, Luke 1: 11-13; Jesus, Matt. 1: 18-21, Luke 1: 26-31.

6. What prophet mentions by name three men eminent for piety and prayer, and who are they? Ans. Ezekiel. Ezek. 14: 14. Noah, Daniel and Job.

[Some readers suggested "Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," referred to by Jeremiah, in Jer. 33: 26, and "Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego," mentioned by Daniel in Dan. 3: 12. Since these answers must be recognized as filling the literal requirements of the question they were accepted as correct.]

7. What member of the early church tried the patience of the beloved disciple by his ambition for leadership? Ans. Diotrephes. III. John 9.

8. To persons meeting what conditions did Jesus declare that he would manifest himself? Ans. Those who have his commandments, and keep them, and love him. John 14: 21.

9. What does the New Testament say of a man who says he loves God yet hates his brother? Ans. "He is a liar." I. John 4: 20.

10. Where should the Christian's eye be directed while he is running his race? Ans. Unto Jesus. Heb. 12: 1-2.

11. What argument does Paul present in a passage in Romans to show that we may ask large things from God? Ans. "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not also with him freely give us all things?" Rom. 8: 32.

12. By what two things does a passage in Revelation declare that Christians are to overcome the devil? Ans. The blood of the Lamb and the word of their testimony. Rev. 12: 11.

A CRUSADER IN SOUTH AMERICA

A BIG, bronzed man made two or three brief stops in New York a few months ago, and between these stops had certain experiences which give some indication of the sort of life not a few modern soldiers of the Cross are called to live. The man was the Rev. John D. McEwen, missionary in Brazil. On the occasion of the first of these recent visits to New York, instead of proceeding to his home in Glengarry, Ontario, as he had planned, he received an unexpected message summoning him to London to confer with the society under whose auspices he works. He returned to New York in a few weeks, reached Glengarry to enjoy the remaining weeks of his furlough and to carry forward the plans he had in mind for raising funds for his work, when he received by cable the heart-breaking news that his wife, who had remained at the mission station with their five children, had died. No particulars accompanied the message. She had been in good health when he left, and had eagerly encouraged his taking the furlough, which would, they hoped, bring funds and strengthening to the work which was upon their hearts. Now, instead of rest and success, came this crushing grief, and the brave missionary returned to his station to learn the full details of his affliction, and to bring the motherless children back to their grandparents' home in Canada.

Mr. McEwen's work in Brazil has been full of incident and real progress. He went to South America in 1899, laboring alone until his wife and their first two children joined him in 1902. He opened a school at the foot of Mount Orobo Grande, two hundred miles west of Bahia City. He has purchased a large tract of land there for the development of his school, and has of late been working to raise money for establishing an industrial department in his institution.

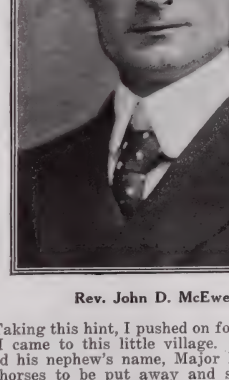
Mrs. McEwen became superintendent of the school, leaving her husband free to pursue his calling as preacher and evangelist. She had been a teacher in the government schools of Nova Scotia, where she received the highest approval of the government school inspector. The sad work of reorganizing this prosperous little mission school to continue its work without her will be difficult indeed.

Mr. McEwen relates, as follows, an interesting event in his Gospel work in the interior of Brazil:

"One time, going far up the country to distribute books which the Bible Society had sent up from the coast, I was met at nightfall by a man on horseback. The Brazilian, with instinctive hospitality, asked, 'Where are you going to stay to-night?'

"I pointed to a light streaming off in the woods, and said, 'I think I shall go over there.'

"He said: 'I don't know that family; but I do know that if you go on to Pau de Pilao, you are sure to be well received if you ask for my uncle, Major Dourado, and mention that his nephew sent you.'



Rev. John D. McEwen

"Taking this hint, I pushed on for about a league, till I came to this little village. The moment he heard his nephew's name, Major Dourado ordered the horses to be put away and supper prepared. His family sat around the table while I told Bible stories, sang Sankey songs, and gave incidents of my journeys. I could hardly get to bed, so eager were they for more.

"More than two years later a strapping, tall man appeared at the mission, and said:

"'Mr. McEwen, I didn't want to pass without thanking you for the great favor you did to my brother-in-law.'

"I asked: 'Who is your brother-in-law?'

"He said: 'Major Dourado.'

"Ah, Pau de Pilao. Yes, I remember staying there all night.

"He said: 'Yes; and that Bible you gave my brother-in-law proved a great blessing. He read it constantly, and of a Sunday, to his neighbors; but my poor brother-in-law took suddenly sick and died the other day. Just before his death the neighbors came in with lighted candles to hold them in his palms according to the Romish custom; but he firmly refused. Then with one hand placed on the Bible near by, and the other hand pointing toward heaven, although he was not able to speak, they all understood that he wished to say: "God's Word is my Light. He is with me; I am safe."' And my visitor went on to say that a smile and light shone on his face. It made a deep impression on the whole village. Then I called Mrs. McEwen, and said: 'I would have come to Brazil just for this.'"

Mr. McEwen has given most attention to the remote peoples in their hut homes in the woods. Here are thousands, even millions, that never once heard the glad news.

"What is needed," he declares, "are hundreds of Rough Riders with the Gospel in their sacks to sell and give away, and the Gospel burning in their hearts to tell out."

Through the great forests of Brazil Mr. McEwen has ridden, stopping at isolated homes and in the towns to tell the people about Christ. The native papers have announced and praised his work, and he has won the respect and support of many. Here is a sample of these quaint reports, indicating the willingness on the part of both the official and unofficial public to hear the plain Gospel:

Rev. J. D. McEwen held on the 11th instant a conference in the town hall. He spoke as to the birth, death, resurrection and return of the Rabbi of Juda, frequently quoting the Bible which he held in his hand. His speech was fluent and within the reach of all. . . . Mr. McEwen closed the conference with sacred hymns, which he sang with a firm true voice full of style and harmony.

The brave, lonely man continues his sacred work within sight of the silent grave of the woman who shared his labors, and with the voices of his little children in faraway Canada ringing in his homesick heart. But one may be sure, if he were asked whether grief or loneliness would turn him from his task, he would answer with St. Paul: "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto me, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry, which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God."

Gloomy Churches

IF DAVID the psalmist king could revisit the world to-day and go into some of our churches, we imagine he would be greatly surprised. David's idea of the sanctuary was that it should be a place of joy and spiritual refreshment, not one of gloom and dulness. "A day in thy courts," he sang, "is better than a thousand . . ." "I will praise the Lord with my whole heart." "I will be glad and rejoice in thee." "I will sing praises to thy name." "I will call upon the Lord who is worthy to be praised." "Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee!"

What a contrast between such a picture as this and that seen in too many of our modern churches! How often we find a tuneless congregation listening to a performance by the choir as it sings piece after piece of complicated music, which the audience follows in the hymnal with eyes alone. Is congregational singing really becoming a thing of the past? We have attended services in which the choir or quartette sang at intervals half a dozen selections from beginning to end, while the standing congregation rose again and again, with hymnbooks open, but sang not at all.

Now, we do not assert that the average congregation does not appreciate good music. But the songs of the church of Christ should in the main be such as all can sing. We read that in the early Christian church, the members comforted themselves "with psalms and hymns and spiritual songs"; they were mostly sung in unison and with hearty fervor. Simple yet tuneful and effective was the church music of a generation ago. To-day, the standard of hymnology in most churches puts congregational participation out of the question, and the result is dulness and indifference.

Nothing could possibly be more unfortunate for a church than to have its congregation voiceless and then listen to a sermon in which the preacher plays with some intellectual problem, neglecting the "corn and wine" of the old Gospel. Such a church is neither hot nor cold, and hardly even lukewarm. It is usually marked by an abundance of empty pews, with a small congregation huddled near the door, ready to leave as soon as the benediction is pronounced.

Do You Like the Picture?

THAT "Rome never changes" is as true to-day as at any time during the last thousand years. That this conclusion is a justifiable one may be gathered from the reports of the conditions prevailing in Vienna during the holding of the Eucharistic Congress, from September 9 to 16. It was a magnificent celebration, and one in which the Roman Church bore a brilliant part. A huge procession was arranged, the aged emperor leading in a carriage drawn by eight milk-white horses, with a large number of rulers, Catholic clergy, high state and civic functionaries, ministers, generals and other illustrious folk following, the whole cortège being over a mile in length. During the procession the Host was to be carried from the high altar in the famous Catholic Cathedral of St. Stephen and escorted to the palace gate, where mass was to be celebrated. But what chiefly interests us in connection with this gorgeous spectacle is this paragraph from the Vienna correspondent of the New York World on September 8:

"All rural districts have been informed by bills on the church walls that whoever attends the Congress and says fervent prayers before any altar on which the Host is exposed is entitled to seven years' indulgence, which he may devote to any soul in purgatory. If prayers are offered up for the aggrandizement of the Church a complete indulgence is insured. The same privilege is accorded to all who take part in the procession and in the Holy Communion on September 15. All priests, down to the lowest degree, are entitled to grant pardon for the mortal sins, which in ordinary times only the bishops can pardon—perjury, murder, incest, arson."

Who after this will dare to assert that Rome today is not the Rome of the Middle Ages? It was the shameless traffic in indulgences conducted by Johann Tetzel, the Dominican monk, which impelled Luther to take the first step toward the Reformation. Tetzel held an appointment as commissary for the sale of indulgences from Leo X, and, beginning in 1517, his work grew so flagrant that it shocked intelligent people everywhere, and Luther denounced him from the pulpit. Tetzel's defiant rejoinder drew forth from Luther the famous 95 theses which Tetzel openly burned in the marketplace at Juterbock—a service for which he was rewarded.

Should Rome succeed in the cherished plan of making America Catholic, how many years must elapse before pardons and indulgences would be sold and given away in the streets of our principal cities? How do Americans like the picture?

The Passing of Nogi

THE self-destruction of Japan's greatest general is indeed a mournful spectacle: a truly great man, wise, brave, kind, efficient, hastening out of life because of faith in baseless superstitions and loyalty to mistaken traditions. His death is still full of mystery. It has been suggested that he hoped by it to rekindle the patriotic fires of Japan. This with him must have meant the hope that Shintoism would become more universally and dominantly prevalent. Such a thought makes his death still more mournful, for that mistaken faith is bound to perish before the resistless advance of truth.

Japan is destined to outgrow not only Shintoism, and any lingering tolerance of the theory that suicide is justifiable, but the passing of Nogi suggests another change that is inevitable. It relates to a principle which is part of the same mistaken philosophy, namely, the disregard of human life in warfare. A sketch of Nogi's life which accompanied the news of his death contained this description of his military tenets: "With General Nogi, as with every other Japanese commander, the question of the cost in life which would be entailed in the execution of any project scarcely entered into the calculation. If it became necessary to secure a certain position, regiments and brigades were hurled to death in a manner which the people of the Western world cannot realize."

That kind of fighting is a thing of the past. The officers of other nations are trained to consider with most painstaking care the cost in life of any military move. The nations, sadly enough, are not yet done with war, but what wars must yet be waged will be marked by a real effort to save the lives of the men through whom the grim tasks must be wrought.

"The old order changeth." The light from Calvary is driving the mists of superstition and the clouds of error from the earth. Christ met death to show men the true value and the true meaning of life. The world is coming, by giant strides, to accept his estimate of life and to put their trust in him for all that lies beyond.

A Word With Our Friends

THE position which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has taken in defending American liberties against the attacks of the Roman Catholic Church is highly commendable and should receive the approval of all liberty-loving citizens. In view of the fact that the Pope at Rome has declared his intention of "making America Catholic," and recognizing the fact that the Catholic Church is the bitter enemy of our beloved institutions, would it not be a wise thing to start a movement to unite all the Protestant churches in a campaign of enlightenment? If the crisis (which is surely coming) is to be averted, it will have to be proclaimed from the Protestant pulpits and through the religious press of the land. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has never failed in any of its undertakings. Through its powerful influence it can perform a highly patriotic service by inaugurating such a movement. M. R.

Crossville, Ill.

I TAKE this opportunity to express my gratitude to you for your attitude on the Roman Catholic question. Would that there were more papers of your quality taking the same position! If you have any samples that you would like to have me discriminatingly distribute, I would gladly do so. I would like to see your subscription list rapidly increase. It should do so. We need more reading of that stamp in our beloved America, which the Roman Catholics are determined to make their own.

The American Protestants are too credulous along this line. Thank God, however, they are becoming awakened to the situation! May the Lord bless you and make you a blessing in your efforts to reach the masses through the medium of a sanctified press. Keep on believing and push the battle, "and the God of all grace be with you."

North Scituate, R. I. L. V. B.

ONE of the finest things in this world is to have right convictions. It's still finer to have the courage to live up to them, isn't it? Our friends—and we have been simply amazed at their number—are showering us with letters of hearty encouragement of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S sturdy attitude in dealing with the Papal threat to "make America Catholic." They're not afraid to speak out, these friends of ours, and this is a time when no good American can afford to be silent.

Now, there never was a time so opportune as the present for earnest right-thinking Americans, who love their country and who long to do it some real service, to accomplish this by taking part in our campaign of publicity and placing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in every home in their acquaintance. This is the best sort of missionary and patriotic service.

We invite our two friends, whose letters we print above, to join with the hundreds of others, like-minded, who are already rolling up big lists of new subscribers for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at a tremendous rate. Even wholly apart from the great problem at issue, they regard it as the most welcome of all the weeklies that visit American homes. But now, with this great issue on hand—and it is one that vitally affects the whole people—there is positively no excuse for any intelligent household remaining in ignorance concerning a question of such tremendous significance to their own and their children's welfare. Even the boys are doing a splendid work, which we describe elsewhere in this number. If our land is to be kept from Roman Catholic domination, then each and every one of us must put a strong shoulder to the wheel to speed along the campaign of enlightenment.

Are you ready to do your share in this important work? If you are, write us to-day with the names and addresses of ten or twenty friends or acquaintances who do not get THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but whom you believe to be interested in the publicity campaign. In this way you can give us material help and at the same time perform a duty on which you will look back with satisfaction in the years to come. To every reader complying with this urgent request and sending us ten or more names and addresses, we will mail the new and valuable booklet, The Papacy in Politics, which will be found comprehensive, accurate and conclusive, affording just the information most needed for general enlightenment at the present time. Address all letters with lists to

General Nogi's Tragic End

AS THE funeral train started with the Mikado's body from the Aoyama parade ground for Momoyama, where the burial was to be held, General Count Marosuke ri, hero of Port Arthur, and Japan's most promit war general, took his own life with a dagger in home at Akassaki. His wife immediately fol- ed his example. Thus was continued the an- t Samurai custom in sorrow at the death of an peror. Nogi and his wife idolized the Mikado, according to the ideas of the race from which came, they thought that perfect loyalty to him uired them to go out of life also and accompany on his long journey. Another motive may e mingled with loyalty to the emperor ch led to the tragic act: the insuffer- e loneliness endured by the general his wife at the loss of the two beauti- sons who were killed in battle in the sso-Japanese War. Nogi sent his two s to the military college to prepare m for the war with Russia that he w was certain to be, and in prepara- for which he had spent his time over war maps and plans since the war be- en China and Japan, in which he had en an active part. In March, 1904, eldest son, Shouten, then twenty-six rs old, came to his father and said he s ready to go. He said: "I am glad I going to the front. There is no hope ny coming back, and I wish mother to e good care of herself. If I die, ise my deeds. You no doubt will go war, but perhaps we will fight in dif- ent places; so I will tell you good-by v. Father, shall we make a race for good name we may win on the battle- d?" The younger son, Hoten, who s twenty-four years old, hearing his ther talking to the general, said: "Fa- r, let me go into the race also." The her answered: "Well, the race of the ee will be very interesting. Each will to win the prize." As Nogi himself s ordered to the front after the boys l gone away, he said: "In my house three of us are soldiers. It may be t all three of us will die, but I do not nt a funeral from my house until the r is ended." The two boys were ed, the older at Nanshan, the younger the fight around 203 Meter Hill in nt of Port Arthur. A little while be- e he was killed he wrote a letter to his ther and enclosed in it some wild flow- picked from the battlefield, with his e. The mother and father used to k at the letter and the pressed flowers l the pictures of the boys and cry over m, and feel proud about them, and say t the Mikado and the country were rthy of their precious lives. Nogi s universally honored and beloved by people of Japan, was shortly to have n made field marshal, and will be ked among the greatest generals of dern time. Japan, especially under administration of the late Mikado, s outgrown many of her feudal cus- ns and adopted those of a Christian civilization. e law of Japan forbids self-destruction under y conditions. Nogi himself forbade his soldiers der any circumstances, however trying, to take ir own lives. Lamenting the sad taking off of gi and his wife in this way, one cannot but com- nd their devotion to the emperor and the nation. every subject of the heavenly King were as loyal him as Nogi to the Mikado the world would soon conquered by the One ho is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and d of lords. (I. Tim. 6: 15.)

Surrenders Royalty For Love

HE engagement of Ella, a favorite granddaughter of Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, to a ng officer of noble but not royal blood was fol- ved by a ceremony in which she renounced all hts as a princess. The princess, who is twenty ars old, fell in love with Count George Waldburg henems, a dragoon officer who was a comrade of r brother during their education. The act of nunciation took place in the ceremonial chamber the Hofburg. The emperor, seated beneath a opy, was surrounded by members of the royal nily and by various court functionaries. The princess took a vow of renunciation and signed the act, and her future husband also renounced all rights in her name. The archduchess showed both good sense and sentiment in trading off the possibility of royal honor for a real man for a husband. It would be well if some American women would show the same wisdom by refusing to trade off real men for husbands for a glittering title of nobility. The royal child of Austria had the higher, holier royalty of love expressed in these words:

Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee. (Sol. Song 4: 7.)

Dying, Thought of Mother

HENRY L. McGOEY, JR., who was a switchboard operator for the New York, Westchester and Boston Railway at Mount Vernon, N. Y., was sent to ground the wires of the electric power system so that painters could work on them. As he was climbing down from an anchor bridge, a wire he carried came in contact with one of the overhead wires carrying 11,000 volts. He was thrown to the ground, his clothing afire, both hands and arms and right leg burned to the bone. He was rushed in an ambulance to the nearest hospital, where, in a short time, he died. He had, during the years spent in perfecting himself as an electrician, lived with his parents and seven brothers and sisters in New Rochelle near by. It was a sad enough thing to see the life of a young man of twenty, with the tides of life running strong, and the impulses of ambition high, snuffed out so suddenly. In dealing with the dangerous electric current managers should see to it that better precautions are taken than were with this young man. It was still more sorrowful to see a young man whose wages aided in the support of a large family taken away. But the young man's death was the more lamentable because of his admirable qualities and beautiful spirit that would so have honored his life and blessed his loved ones and his fellow men. Out of the terrible darkness of this tragedy this beautiful spirit expressed itself. Though suffering intolerable anguish, he clenched his teeth and did not utter a complaint until he died. He told the physician the reason he did not groan or cry out with the pain was because he was afraid it would disturb the other patients. The first thing he said when he reached the hospital was: "Don't let my mother know anything about this. She is sick, and if she does it will make her much worse. Please don't tell her." That boy's mother trained him right. Whatever Sunday school or church he attended, he had learned in the school of Christ, and had caught his spirit. From our side of the river we call such a going out of a life a sad thing, a horrible tragedy; from the other side of the river and from those on this side with eyes keen enough, such a death is only the passing over into wider fields of activity, beauty and enjoyment. The sweet thoughts of young hero McGoey about his mother call to mind the relationship between motherhood and the dying boy, where the child who was sunstruck in the harvest field was carried to his mother's lap, where she held him till he died.

He sat on her knee till noon and then died. (II. Kings 4: 20.)

Falls Asleep Plowing

ARTHUR SCHULTZ, a farm hand residing near Chippewa Falls, Wis., when plowing the other day in the field, fell asleep, and losing control of himself for a moment he also lost control of his horses and they ran away with him. The lines became entangled around his feet and he was dragged over the ground and fatally injured. There are not many farmers who fall asleep while plowing. But there are many in the religious field that are asleep at their plows. They have hold of the handles of the plow and have started on the furrow, and they are sound asleep leaning on those handles. They go to the church and are thinking about something else all the time. Or they stay away from the Sunday service to read the Sunday newspaper, or to go on the automobile ride. They never think of the week-night prayer service except when the minister announces it from the pulpit. They ride by the hovel where the poor widow and orphans suffer and never dream of their struggles. They know there are unchurched and wicked men and women living in their neighborhoods, who are waiting for a brother's and a sister's hand to come and save them, and yet they are completely insensible to all these calls of responsibility. They are professed Christians, church members, but they are spiritually sound asleep. They are in the Gospel field behind the plow, but they are asleep on their jobs. The misfortune is that in so many instances the horses run away with the man asleep at his plow and fatally injure him. The stupor of the Christian often sinks down into the sleep of death. If Christ pronounced as unfit for his kingdom the man who put his hand to the Gospel plow and looked back, what would he say of those who pretend to plow the Gospel field and fall asleep at their task?

And Jesus said unto him, No man, having put his hand to the plow, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God. (Luke 9: 62.)

Make Hazing a Crime

THE other day President Venable and the trustees of the University of North Carolina passed a set of resolutions asking the State legislature to pass a law making hazing in college a crime. This action was taken on account of the killing of William Rand on the morning of September 14 by four hazers, who were fellow students. Hazing is supposed to be fun; but it often becomes serious fun, and too often a tragedy. It is a relic of barbarism that is shut out of many colleges, and should be driven from all. If the school or college authorities have not the wisdom or discipline to stop it, then laws making it a crime should be passed in all the States and the law rigidly enforced. It may be fun to the bandits, but it may be death to the victim and his family.

Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; . . . but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment. (Eccles. 11: 9.)

HOW TO BE TRULY BLESSED*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

IT IS a rule of common politeness that one should always come to his meals cleanly, well brushed, and with well-ordered garments. But these requirements meant more to the Pharisees than common politeness. They were a part of their religious duties. Not only hands and face received attention; they also washed their feet before coming to the table, because they wore sandals, which did not protect their feet from the dust of the streets or the roads. On some occasions they laid aside their own garments, and put on those provided by the host, as in case of a wedding. Jesus observed these washings, and when they were omitted, he sometimes commented upon the lapse, as in the case of Simon, who had invited his Pharisee friends and Jesus to dine with him. It was there that Mary the Magdalene came in, and washed Jesus' feet with her tears, and wiped them with her hair. And when Simon demurred, Jesus reminded him that he had not given him water for washing his feet (Luke 7: 36-46). Before eating the last Passover feast with his apostles, Jesus washed their feet (John 13: 1-12).

Notwithstanding Jesus' regard for these matters, there were some Pharisees who found fault with him; he did not reach their standard! On the other hand, those same Pharisees did not reach Jesus' standard, because they had a wrong notion about how to serve God. They were concerned only about the forms of service, and had made for themselves so many rules that a religious life was a great burden. They had done this with little or no thought about having their inner life pure and undefiled before God; washings and fasts were the chief of their concerns.

"Why walk not thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders?" The Pharisees came to Jesus with this question, and in so doing they seemed to be most pious. But Jesus lifted the thin veil of their hypocrisy when he said: "Ye leave the commandment of God, and hold fast the tradition of men." And then Jesus went on and said more, that their false standard might be branded, so that others should not be misled.

CHRIST'S REPROOF OF THE PHARISEES

(From the picture by Edward Armatage, R.A., in the Mappin Art Gallery, Sheffield, England)

AS the teachings of our Saviour were in so many respects antagonistic to those of the Pharisees the occasions recorded in Scripture, upon which he denounced them in the sternest language are many. Of all of these none has made a more lasting impression upon art than the one which provides the subject for the picture here reproduced. The similarity of the provocation in the episode here portrayed and in the one which forms our present lesson is very evident. The Pharisees, as usual, were insisting upon the letter of the law without a thought as to the deeper meaning which Christ sought to impress upon them.

The Teaching of Christ and of the Pharisees

It would not be profitable for us to enter into all the details of the Pharisaic laws and regulations. Suffice it that it was their teaching that "Whosoever hath his dwelling-place in the land of Israel, and eateth his common food in cleanness (with washed hands) and speaks the holy language (Hebrew) and recites his phylacteries morning and evening, let him be confident that he shall obtain the life of the world to come." Compare with this the teaching of the passage chosen for our Golden Text: "The kingdom of God is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit." (Rom. 14: 17.) While the law of the Pharisees emphasizes outwardness the law of God interpreted by the apostle Paul sets forth true inwardness as the right standard, for the hands and feet will move in right directions to accomplish all good if only the heart is right with God.

A lady spending some time in India had a strong desire to secure an interview with a so-called "holy man," who dwelt in solitude on the heights of the Himalayas. She obtained his consent through some Hindu pilgrims who preceded her, and she afterwards undertook the perilous journey alone, being carried up the mountains by professional bearers, who at first insisted upon blindfolding her that she might not see the wild leaps they must make. She, however, did not consent to the blindfolding. When the ascent was accomplished, and she was ushered into the presence of the Yogi (holy man) she was strongly impressed by the exceeding ethereal purity of his appearance. His flesh seemed almost to be transfigured by the abstemious life he had been leading "for two hundred years" he told her. He also said that he expected to live three hundred years longer! But what of it? That life was tainly of very little use to his fellow men, beca he came in contact with so few of them, and those who were of the highest type climbed to lofty abode among the snows. Living a life of highest morality, devoting his mind to the templation of that which is best according to lights, this man in spite of all this had lost in forms—the meditations, the oft repeated pray and the fastings—the true spirit even of his heathen cult, which though now so debased, cam the Orient from the brain of its founder as a rev tion of higher and better things than it then kn

Righteousness, Peace,

There are three st of blessedness which ceed from the inner that is right with As to righteousness the life, it must first planted in the he Henry Ward Beec once said: "Suppos should go out and m a bed in my garden, say, 'Lord, be pleased reveal to me twenty lips,' and they should come. Suppose I sho pray the same th four or five times o and then they should come; then suppose Lord sent an angel explain to me the rea why this prayer was answered. The an would say, 'Have planted any tulips?' 'Well, if you plant so tulips you will get bl soms; if you do not, y will get none.'" So flowers of righteousn will not appear in hum life until the Holy Spi which is the root of righteousness, is plan in the heart. So-cal morality apart from Holy Spirit is to be co pared with some flowers and some fruits which call "mock," mock seringa, mock oranges, wh have the appearance of the genuine but lack essence which makes the real flowers and the fruit desirable.

Peace is a state of blessedness, even more to desired than happiness. "Thou wilt keep him perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee." Theodore L. Cuyler has said: "When guilt is p doned, and the penitent soul is restored to divi favor, when conscience no longer stings like scorpion, but smiles its approval, then the Lo becomes our strength and our song, and we can dr with joy out of the wells of salvation. All th joys God provides for us, and offers them to We cannot create canary birds, but we can provi cages for them, and fill our rooms with their mus Even so we cannot create the heavenly gifts whi Jesus offers, but they are ours if we furnish hea

[Questions and brief suggestions as to improvement of Sunday school invited.]

—ONE GOOD WAY TO get new members every week for the Sunday school is to put on the school record after every new name the name also of the person by whose influence or invitation the member declares he was induced to join the school. At every quarterly review the name of every one who has brought even one new member should be publicly read with appreciation, the reading beginning with the winner of the lowest number and ending with the highest, to whom special honor should be given. (It is questionable whether any prize of value should be awarded for such a service.) Once a year the names of at least the most faithful workers for new members should be read, in that case counting only new members who had "stuck" for a whole year. This will prompt those who bring new members to help in keeping them.

—AN INSPIRING EXAMPLE of persistent fidelity in this work of increasing the Sunday school was seen in the Dover (N. H.) Methodist Church, years ago, in the case of a woman who had the whole care of a little child and an old man in second childhood. Her duties included all the housekeeping. She had no social standing nor wealth nor education—not even beauty, for her face had been scalded in childhood. But that woman, by daily devotion to this one purpose of building up the Sunday school and benefiting her neighbors by getting them—old and young—under its influence, succeeded, in a church-going, New England city of only about ten thousand population in her day, in bringing in a full five hundred into that Sunday school, up to the time when the present teachers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Million Bible Class had charge of the church. She lived long afterwards and probably filled a whole regiment before she died, fulfilling the promise that "one shall chase a thousand." It was not due to any unusual ability, but only to unusual persistency and fidelity. On the way to market she won many of her trophies day by day, asking every boy and girl she met whom she did not know to be in some Sunday school to come, and not quitting when once rebuffed. To win older people she called on them in their shops and homes, and there also she did not accept a refusal as final, but cheerily renewed the attack till she won.

—ONE OF THE MOST inspiring illustrations of bringing Sunday school members into the membership of the church was the case of Mrs. Bartlett in Mr. Spurgeon's church. When the writer first heard Mr. Spurgeon she had brought seven hundred persons from her adult Bible class into full membership in that church in a series of years. So far as one could judge from her teaching and appearance and from what information was available, this very unusual harvesting for God was not due to wealth or education or social graces, for she was just a plain old-fashioned Christian woman of ordinary ability—extraordinary only in the persistency and enthusiasm and consecration with which she worked daily at her harvesting. Every week she must add to the membership of her Bible class of men and women, and every week she must lead some of them to dedicate their lives to Christ and to the church.

—IN THE FACE OF all those passing events which disrupt a Sunday school session, the pastor, superintendent, or teacher must never lose presence of mind. In a certain New York church the whole length of the Sunday school room was on the street, and one Sunday while the preacher was giving the "pastor's review" of the lesson, a fire engine swept by, and its tide of influence brought every boy to his feet, ready to break for the door. The preacher said quickly, though quietly, "You mustn't mind those little boys that never saw a fire." Every boy down in haste, with a look on his face of fairly beaten.

—SO MUCH HAS BEEN said about superinte ents talking too much that some who know h to talk effectively don't talk enough. Ra Wells and B. F. Jacobs and D. L. Moody w all good superintendents, and all of them w accustomed to introduce as well as review lesson, taking as much as fifteen minut mostly saved by not singing to kill time. It not to be expected that the average teac will be able to express the truths of the less as clearly and impressively as the pastor superintendent, who should make sure, wh ever teachers may do, that some interesti start is given to the lesson for the whole sch and some practical duty is learned as its fitti climax.

—ONE OF THE BEST superintendents the wri has known drilled the school in weekly revie for a good quarterly review by making sure whole school and each separate class could peat the Golden Text on the first word bei spoken, and name one practical duty learn which was represented by a symbol on blackboard.

OUTSIDE THE GATE

BY ANNA E. FINN

IT WAS the first object Easton's eyes fell on, when, having climbed the dark, narrow stairs and quietly unlocked the door to Flat Seven, he entered the small sitting-room. The picture, a large old-time photograph in a modest frame, hung to the right of the mantle as he entered, away from the strong sunlight that might add to the fading the years had already brought. It was the first thing he saw always on coming home unless it danced to be Anne's and the Boy's faces, eagerly, stillingly awaiting his return at the appointed hour. To-day he had gotten back earlier, and he tiptoed to the sitting-room and peeped into the little bedroom beyond. She had kept her promise to him after all, as she always did even in the small things, and was lying down resting beside the Boy as he slept in his white crib. At first he thought she too slept, and he stood without speaking, watching them. Her face, in the little blue heart pillow with its dainty ruffled rip that her skilful hands had made, was turned away from his own toward the child's. He could see the delicate contour of her face, the fine hair, tumbled, as it grew away in soft waves from her brow; one hand—still white, he noted, in spite of manual work—lay palm up on the coverlet. He could hear the deep breathing of the sleeping child, could see through the white bars the baby face and one moist fist uplifted in an apparent effort to reach his mother's hand as he had dropped off to sleep. The more quiet breathing of the woman could be heard too, and as he moved a little he could see that while her body rested, her mind was active and awake. . . . Watching, he forgot the picture in the hall, forgot the struggle of the years and his effort to "make good"; remembered only that through it all Anne had clung to him in her woman's weakness and her woman's strength—Anne, whom he had known since she was six — his, Easton's, sweetheart always. He even forgot the regrets that rarely left him and which had touched his face with premature lines, his hair with gray; forgot how pitiably little he had given her of anything save his great love in the seven years of their married life together. As if feeling his presence and his love, Anne slowly turned her head and their eyes met—in hers a smile. He had sometimes marveled that even in extreme moments he had not been able to surprise that smile away, that it was as a beacon light lit for him, for his safety and guidance when the seas were dark. In season and out of season, and in all hours since the Great Shadow of the Closed Gate had fallen on him, it had never failed. In the gloom of the one small room he called his office across the bridge in the modern skyscraper, when he sat in stoic silence waiting for the clients that seldom came, he could feel it down in the silences of his shadowed soul; and in the thought of her and of that light that lived in her eyes for him alone, he found his grip on things again and the brave front he showed the world.

She rose softly, so as not to disturb the child, and crept out of the room with him into the larger one beyond, closing the door gently so they might talk.

"O David!" she cried, "you came home early and wasn't at the door to meet you. And Boy! he will be so disappointed when he wakes up. He counts on watching you come up the corner from the window. David! David!"

She clung to him, as though they had been parted for months; she smoothed his hair and patted his hand, and in silence he laid his thin cheek against her own and held her to him. Something in the act, in the lack of further greeting, made her look up into his face quickly, and the light faded from her own a little, though her eyes still smiled. She pulled him to the morris chair before the fireplace, where a tiny blaze was burning, knelt down on the floor and drew his arm about her. Leaning forward he stared into the burning coals, the lines deepening in his thin face and the shadows in his tired eyes. She watched him, her heart yearning over him as it had yearned so long, and waited for him to speak.

Illustrated by Lawrence Herndon

She pulled him to the morris chair before the fireplace

"I saw 'Mugs' to-day," he said at last in a low voice; "his ship is at the yard. He is ordnance officer."

She caught her breath quickly, but did not speak, only laid her cheek down against his knee, as she too watched the fire. The old struggle was on again; all she could do was to listen and to wait. The time for comfort would come later.

"I met him on Myrtle Avenue. He is boarding with Mary and the little Commodore near DeKalb—in one of those big brown fronts, you know—opposite the park."

The fire burned on. It was a brave little fire, and tried to light up to brightness the few really rare and pretty objects in the room: a Persian rug, some wall hangings from Peking, one or two fine old engravings, a piece of Satsuma, and some drawn and embroidery work from the Madeiras; but even its brave efforts could not reach the old framed photograph to the right and light it up, as it hung in shadow, or touch the navy football flag that hung above it.

Easton's eyes sought it out, however, and in the silence they rested on it and on the flag, which was one Anne had carried when he was on the team, his first class-year. The photograph—he was too tired even to count how old the photograph was—had belonged to his father years before his retirement. It was a picture of the main gate to the Naval Academy. Beyond the faded outlines of the iron bars was the semblance of faded trees, and as his eyes rested on the picture, they seemed to penetrate beyond the bars and the trees into regions where he might dwell only in memories. Such a long, long cry from the shade and shelter of that land beyond the gate, where as a child he had lived when his father was on duty there; where he had first met Anne; where—was it really David Easton who had marched there with the batallion?—to this little Brooklyn flat, lost in the life of the great twin cities, out of the service; How had it happened? Had he been to blame? Was it possible that he, in love with an officer's daughter, born of a long line of navy men, brought up in the service, whose breath was the odor of the salt sea, whose life was the routine of military code, had trifled with his chances, had through boyish ignorance and indifference thrown that life away—for this? Outside of Anne and the Boy and the fiddle perhaps, what could life offer him to "make good"? Would a great name at the bar compensate for the longing for the deck beneath his feet again? Was the power to sway men by eloquence equal to the authority that could control and master his division in peace as well as war? Was the might of the law equal to the might of the great engines straining and pulsing, to the strength of the guns in the turrets? Could the faces of the jury and the judge replace the faces at the long table in the ward-room mess?

Had he failed to make his two-five on that examination in navigation, just three months before his graduation? . . . He turned his eyes away from the faded picture, and his head sank a little lower on his breast. His eyes went back to the fire. That he had not failed he knew in those innermost recesses of his being where every man stands stripped of all save truth. That his case and Elkhart's were still remembered, still spoken of with regret by many of the service, had had no power to change the fact that he and Elkhart had "bilged," that Waterman though lower in class standing had been retained. Waterman's father, a member of Congress, had been a friend of Gupper, the superintendent. The enmity between Elkhart's uncle and the superintendent had never been concealed; but Easton stood between. Easton had been reached because of Elkhart. And because when a target has been hit through a barrier, the barrier wall is crumbled, Easton had been "bilged" too. That two-forty-nine! It had not been a two-forty-nine for either Elkhart or himself, or—if it had, it had been a lower mark for Waterman! Waterman was a senior lieutenant now, one of the best on the list, Easton remembered; cool, able, fit to be retained,

Christian Herald Bo

RECENTLY an interesting story was printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD entitled "The New Pony Express," in which we told THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family and friends about the wonderful way through which bright and intelligent boys, members of the best CHRISTIAN HERALD families and churches and Sunday schools throughout the United States and Canada were helping us all to accomplish the task of reaching the Million Mark in circulation.

We want to tell you more about THE CHRISTIAN HERALD boys and their work.

You know there are millions of Protestant homes in the United States and Canada, into many of which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has never yet entered. In order to be appreciated and taken regularly in these homes, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD must be read, not once, but many times. Many people who believe, on first sight, that they would like to take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD regularly, prefer to examine it from week to week for a while.

This is where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD boy comes in.

Since the 1st of January, 1912, CHRISTIAN HERALD boys have introduced THE CHRISTIAN HERALD into thousands of new homes where it was not known before and where it is now welcomed regularly every week.

From a small group of a dozen boy representatives, the Boy Organization has become a sales division to be proud of. Thousands of boys are delivering copies every week to their friends and customers in the homes and places of business of the people. We could print, if space would allow, the photographs of hundreds more of these bright lads who have proudly sent us their pictures upon request.

The boys themselves like the work of selling THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many reasons. Foremost among these are the following:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD helps the boy start by providing part of his first capital. We ask him to provide the other part in order to assure us that he means to do his best to sell the copies sent.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD plan enables the boy to make a steady weekly income, large or small, depending entirely upon the ability of the boy. Twenty-five copies sold each week, for example, will pay 50 cents per week profit, or $26 per year. Fifty copies sold weekly will pay $1 per week profit, or $52 per year, and so on—a decidedly good income for spare-time, after-school work for a boy.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD plan does not interfere with the boy's school or home duties; it supplements them to a very large degree by helping him practice many of the very principles of business which he is learning at school and at home. While earning a small income, he is at the same time, through seizing this opportunity, "making a life," understanding the value of "grit" and "enthusiasm," of "good manners" and of "tact," of "self-reliance" and of "thoroughness." He is "making his character" through CHRISTIAN HERALD work.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers for national competition between the boys upon a fair, equitable basis, Shetland Pony and Cash and Premium Prizes of very great value. Shetland Pony Outfits (or $100 when preferred) have been awarded to the following boys during the last six months: Fred Bu... Ontario; Harry A. Crumbling, Maryland; Harold P. Cah... New York; Percy Huffman, Pennsylvania; Andrew Paint... Ontario; Young Taylor, Kentucky; W. O. Gardner, Cana...

Hundreds of watches and thousands of premium pri... have also been sent. The boys have also earned many th... sands of dollars.

Ten Thousand More Boys Wanted

When a comparatively small number of boys comprising ... organization only eight months old has done such wonder... work, we are sure you will agree with us in our belief th... if we can secure and add to our Boy Organization 10,... more boys, we will have gone a long distance upward tow... the Million Mark, because we know that CHRISTIAN HER... boys not only are very happy in helping to extend the influe... of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by selling copies to new frien... but that through their boundless energy the aggregate numb... of sales made by such a number of boys will, through y... help, quickly bring success to this campaign.

How shall we get these boys to take an interest in this wo... which is so wonderfully beneficial both to the boys and to T... CHRISTIAN HERALD family? How shall we secure 10,000 b... at the beginning of this fall and winter season in the short... possible time? Only with your personal help. If you ... help us we will secure the boys. We know you will, as y... have in the past, so we have provided special coupons for y... use, each of them good for sixty cents as described, and in ... dition, we will give you free for your trouble the splen... premiums described upon the following page.

For every member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family w... induces one boy to send in one of the coupons on th... pages, properly endorsed, the number and influence of T... CHRISTIAN HERALD family will be increased at once by ... proximately ten new homes. Some of our boys are selling ... many as 200, 300, 400 or more copies per week. Perhaps ... boy or boys you start will find it as easy to introduce T... CHRISTIAN HERALD as these boys have, and as easy to mak... weekly income and earn the prizes which these boys h... earned.

This Is Our Plan

On these pages you will find four coupons. Please t... them apart on the dotted lines, and after filling in your na... in the proper space as endorser, hand them to boys whom ... know or whom you can induce to start in this spare-ti... after-school CHRISTIAN HERALD work. It will take up l... little of their time each week. Tell these boys about T... CHRISTIAN HERALD opportunity and about our helpful ... Organization. Point out to them that, if they explain ... beauty and richness and attractiveness of THE CHRISTI... HERALD to others, they will have no difficulty in selli... their first supply, and in this way not only give the plan... thorough trial but get entered in our interesting Boy Co... petitive Contests. Point out to the boys that we provide th... with part of their first capital. All they have to do is to s... 15 cents, together with the coupon, which has an additio... value of 60 cents as explained. Tell these boys that T... CHRISTIAN HERALD will at once start to help them in ma... ways from our home office in New York. They will earn t... cents on every copy that is sold and also receive many attr... tive premium prizes from week to week. The boy in yo... home may be one of the boys whom you can start. Indeed, ... may have several boy chums who would like to join with h... in this work. Enrolled on our staff are boys, the sons of m... isters, doctors, lawyers and of the leading business and p... fessional men and working men in the country. We wish ... could send you on for examination some of the interesting l... ters from their parents, thanking us for the valuable ho... which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD work has been to their sons...

although in "math" and "skinny" and the other things he had been the "wooden" man in his class. Perhaps he was making a better officer than either Elkhart or himself would have made—Elkhart, one of the star men in "math," and himself leading in his plebe year in English and in "skinny."

Well, Waterman had been given his chance; the other two had not, although the Secretary of the Navy, unable to discover conditions warranting the superintendent's drastic action, had twice recommended the case for reconsideration. A strange tyranny in a free land it was, that gave one man, in spite of high protest, such power to overrule. A position needing force and tact, discernment, justice, discipline, the cool judgment that could weigh, and weighing know the pure gold from the dross. Elkhart had gone West and the silence of the years and the great distance had swallowed him up until one day there came back East the news that in Arizona he had died.

The fire burned low and still Easton sat staring into the coals. With a swift movement he leaned forward and drew Anne into his arms and held her there, and, spreading his large hand, heavily veined, over her head, pressed it to his breast. He had almost forgotten Anne—Anne, who alone in all the world knew him as he was; who fathomed his thought almost before his conscious knowledge of it; who daily, hourly had suffered with him since the day when he had laid the cadet clothes in his trunk and in citizen's dress had passed through the academy grounds, beyond the gate, to the Shadow of the outside where she had been waiting for him to see him to the train. After all, the service had been her life too, her father an officer and her brother an ensign, a sister married to a fellow whom he, as an upper classman, had helped good-naturedly to "run" as a plebe. Well, he had "Frenched" in those academy days; sometimes had not turned in at "taps" or out at "reveille"; but he had always left a safe margin to his credit on his demerit record. He had never to his own inner knowledge brought dishonor to his name then—the name of his father who had fought with Farragut—or to her who all the world guessed then would take it on graduation for her own.

She had refused to release him when for him and Elkhart there had been no "class day," no coming forth in their new uniforms before their mates, no diploma for the four long, hard, wonderful years of work, no graduation; and on that day in April before he "left" the academy, a "bilged" man, she had made her father and mother open their house on Blake Row for an "afternoon," where slender, proud, with luminous eyes that never faltered before the curious looks, she had publicly announced her engagement to him. She waited five years while he worked in an office in New York by day and studied law by night; waited until he was admitted to the bar and had gained a small foothold for himself in serving subpœnas and similar humble tasks; and then, refusing to wait longer, had quietly married him. How distinctly he recalled the day (it was after the parents of both were dead), how, since there was no money for a "trip," he had brought her directly here, and how they had made of the four rooms a home, the ugly painted walls and bare floors covered with the treasures he had gotten from his practice cruises and with the things their parents had gathered when abroad.

To-night the bitterness and the longing were on him afresh, and he had brought the struggle and the darkness of it home to Anne—his harbor for the tired craft of his heart. Not even the violin on the shelf above the low bookcase, which came after Anne and Boy and the service in his heart, could to-night make the regrets lie still. He had run across "Mugs" again, the classmate, the room-mate of the Annapolis years; "Mugs," the only one of his class who really ever tried to keep track of him, and whose letters even, of late, he had avoided. "Mugs" had carried him off to the ship for lunch, and he remembered being acutely glad that he happened to be wearing his one best and prosperous-looking suit. From Anne he might not hide the depths of his life struggle, but none of the men, not even "Mugs," must guess just how hard it was to get along; how few the clients were, how slow in pay. For an hour he was one of them again. How familiar the steps of the ladder under his shoes, twice re-soled but spotlessly shining; how good to look upon were the great turret guns; how easy the ward-room transom and the comfortable dining-chairs; how blissfully, delightfully cramped "Mugs's" quarters, with their photographs of Mary and the little Commodore! The reaction had come on the way home, the culmination now.

From the next room came a low chatter.

"It's Boy talking to his toes," said Anne, and the smile in her eyes deepened and crept downward to her tender mouth. She rose and went into the bedroom, and when she came back she led the child up to Easton's chair, a sturdy three-year-old in a white piqué Russian blouse.

He leaned forward and took the boy up, perched him on the arm of the morris chair beside him, while Anne lighted the lamp—oil was pleasanter than gas, and cheaper—and its softened light from beneath the green shade fell on the man and the child. Easton squeezed Boy's chin between his fingers and Boy beamed on him with appreciating benignity. Slowly the lines receded from Easton's face, the weariness from the mouth; he no longer looked at the faded picture near the mantel, but into the child's clear eyes. He had never admitted even to Anne what the Boy had meant to him. He sometimes wondered if he did not mean more to Anne and himself in their straightened, narrowed, shadowed life than even the Commodore meant to "Mugs" and Mary. Anne watched the two profiles, the big one and the small one, so alike, facing each other and smiling in friendly understanding, and then she crept away to see about supper. They followed her shortly, both conscious of the fact that she had left, although they did not see her go; and Easton set the table while Anne made coffee for two, and prepared a bowl of bread and milk for Boy which he ate from his tall chair, cheerfully, the while superintending his father's affairs.

It was not until the few dishes were washed up and Boy safe asleep for the night that Easton broached the subject of having "Mugs" and Mary in for supper some evening.

"Couldn't we manage it?" he asked Anne somewhat wistfully. "Bridget might come in and help, and—and I'd like to have it as nice an affair as we could," he added with a short laugh.

Anne showed no surprise nor any of the trepidation that took possession of her soul. It was the one purely personal request he had made in all the years.

She consented gleefully, hiding her misgivings.

Easton was detained late the night of the dinner. Clients with profitable cases were too few to allow putting off and it was almost time for "Mugs" and Mary to arrive when he hurriedly turned the latchkey in his front door. It was not the old picture that first met his eyes to-night, but Anne, tall and lovely, in a pale blue dress, a white rose at her breast, the soft color

A SHIRTWAIST CHOIR 700 STRONG

ON THE afternoon of the last Sunday in August, nearly fifteen hundred Bible students gathered at the Anthony Drexel estate in Lansdowne, Pa. The occasion was the open air rally of the Drexel Biddle Bible classes at the beautiful summer home which has been provided by the wealthy and enthusiastic young Philadelphian who is the founder and organizer of this interdenominational movement. Churches in Philadelphia, Norristown, Chester, Conshohocken, Plymouth Meeting, Garrettford, Wilmington, Del.; Marshallton, Del.; Tacony, Holmesburg and Danville were represented by their Bible study classes.

A. J. Drexel Biddle, as president of the organization, greeted the students, stating the object of the rally to be a demonstration of strength and scope of the work that this big Bible class is doing. The only aim of the movement is to enlist a great army of souls who will study carefully and give their most devoted efforts to the cause of the Master.

One of the inspiring features of the exercises was the singing of an informally dressed choir of seven hundred men and women under the leadership of William J. McEwen of Philadelphia. Arrangements had been made for this musical demonstration out of doors, and its splendid success proved how efficiently they had been planned.

Among some of the prominent church workers present were: Rev. W. S. Neall, of the Holy Apostles' Protestant Episcopal Church; Rev. E. D. Cone, of Holy Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church; Rev. George Gassner, chaplain of the Seamen's Mission; Rev. John A. Hookway, of Wyoming Avenue Baptist Church, of Philadelphia; Rev. Lima C. Drake, of the Garrettford Baptist Church; and Directing First Vice Presidents William J. McEwen, Thomas McGarvey and F. Thomas Landis.

OUTSIDE THE GATE

coming and going in her cheeks, who met him at the sitting-room door. With eager tenderness she drew him in and stood aside, her eyes smiling shyly as they used to do years ago down at the old academy. Inside, the pretty lamps and the shaded gas jets cast softened lights and shadows. A cheerful, friendly little fire in the grate glowed its welcome; in the window recess three plants of rose geranium bloomed. Through the half-open door he caught sight of Boy, sitting bolt upright in his little white crib, early undressed and put to bed, but very quiet and very good and very much impressed with the occasion, waiting only for his father's good-night kiss without which he was not content to sleep. He crawled to the foot of the crib and pulled himself up, a chubby little form in wee pajamas, all curves and smiles. Easton, with one grateful look at Anne, went in to dress. Through the door beyond he caught a glimpse of a small white table, set with pretty wedding silver long packed away; fresh flowers, and candles with soft pink shades; of Bridget, in dainty white apron and waitress cap. He told Boy a wonderful story of an elephant and a catapillar, evolved from the depths of his own excited brain, as he struggled with his shirt-front studs, and in the most thrilling part, when the elephant had let the caterpillar go to bed in his ear, a stud fell on the floor, and the front doorbell rang. He rummaged in wild haste, Boy directing and gesticulating in momentary danger of overbalancing from the crib. The stud was recovered, likewise Boy's equilibrium. The toilet was finished with despatch and taste, and Boy was left to ponder on the mysteries of "tumpany" in general and "tatapillars" in particular, and, so pondering, fell asleep.

DREAMING OF HOME

I

DREAMING of home; the old familiar faces,
Forms that I love, I see them gathered there;
Round the old hearth in their accustomed places,
Eyes dimmed by tears look on my vacant chair.
Hark! now I hear their dear, sweet voices singing
Fair hymns of praise unto their God on high;
Else 'tis the angels, some glad message bringing
From the old home to cheer me ere I die.
See! there's the picture, father, mother, kneeling
Low, as of old, in faithful, earnest prayer.
Answer to-night, I pray, thy love revealing;
Let me once more kneel at the old home chair!

II

Dreaming of home; my pilgrimage here ended,
Forms that I love await my coming there.
Round God's great throne methinks I hear them singing
Glad songs of welcome to that city fair.
Gone are the tears, the sorrow and the sighing,
Gone are the throbbing heartaches of the past;
Where now the sadness and the pain of dying,
Where now the fears of grim Death's chilling blast?
Father and mother, loved ones there are waiting;
Waiting to welcome home their wandering child.
Footsore and weary home to-night I'm coming,
Tired of my wanderings through this lonely wild.

Dreaming of home! Oh, rouse me not from slumber!
Fold now my hands above my quiet breast;
Sing to me some dear song of home and mother,
Let me pass, dreaming, to the Homeland blest.

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making
will improve your pastry

Because of its pure vegetable origin, Crisco will make your pies and puddings so perfectly digestible that no member of your family need deny himself the pleasure of eating them.

It will make the crust deliciously tender, light and flaky—so much so that even the under crust which so easily becomes tough and hard always will be crisp and easy to cut.

It will give a flavor as delicious as butter—yet at half the cost—for, in addition to all its other advantages, the price of Crisco is but half that of butter and materially less than the least expensive of other cooking fats.

Use a fifth less of Crisco than of other shortenings. When used instead of butter, add salt, one teaspoonful to a cupful of Crisco.

American Buddhist Priests in Ceylon

A GOOD deal of excitement has been caused in the Southern Province of Ceylon by the recent establishment of a brotherhood of White Buddhist Monks. Being in the district of this settlement I felt led to pay these Western converts to Buddhism a visit a few days ago. They reside on a picturesque little island in a backwater lake, quite near to the seaside. The island is three acres in extent and, with the exception of the small portion cleared to accommodate the newcomers, is covered with thick forest undergrowth. In this lovely and lonely spot live five white priests, two of them Germans and three hailing from America. They have each a little wooden hut about ten feet square. Here, buried away from the world with changed names, with shaven heads, and clad in the bright yellow robe of the Buddhist priest, these men, raised in the West, cradled in Christianity, are presumably seeking the so-called enlightenment of Gautama Buddha. The leader of the party, called, I was informed, the High Priest, is a German who had spent a few years in Burma, where he was ordained a Buddhist priest, and came to Ceylon eighteen months ago.

A Typical Ceylon Buddhist Priest

The robe he wears is brilliant yellow. As Buddhist priests are forbidden to look at a woman, a fan is carried and held before the eyes when ladies are present or should a woman be met on the street.

One of the lay managers of the settlement, a man who had known me for twenty-five years, introduced me to the hermits, previously obtaining permission to do so from the occupant of each hut in succession. This manager, a stanch Buddhist, needless to say, was boasting of the fact that Westerners were becoming Buddhists, and said, "Who would have thought twenty-five years ago that Europeans would come here as Buddhist priests!" The island, he prophesied, would soon be full of White Buddhist priests. The first hut we visited was the home of Henry P. Clarke, a curly-headed, bright-eyed young fellow of thirty years of age, who looked and spoke as if he might have just stepped out of a skyscraper office in lower Broadway, New York. Indeed, he had but recently left America, for he told me he had arrived in Ceylon only a week ago, having come direct from New York City. He had lived in One Hundred and Sixth Street, somewhere near Central Park, I believe. He had not yet taken the robes, and wore the white cloth and jacket of an Upasakarala, a religious layman. I spent a short while in conversation with him, and he was interested in knowing that I had been in America but a year ago. I mentioned to him among other things the conversion of a leading Buddhist of the district at the age of forty, a man who had become a deeply pious and most earnest Christian.

Ceylon Buddhists have during the last thirty years been rapidly assimilating Christian ideas and nomenclature. They now have Sunday schools, commemorate Buddha's birthday as Christians do Christmas, speak of Gautama as "our Lord," Buddhist temples as "churches," and Buddhist priests are given the title of "Reverend." So the name of the next monk I visited was given me by our guide as the Rev. Assaje. This gentleman is also a pure-born American, and a year ago was known as Mr. Franklin. He appears to be about forty-five years of age, and had, he told me, been raised in Wisconsin. Before the interview he had asked our guide whether our party were Christians or Buddhists, and I fancied from his opening remarks that he was prepared for discussion. But I imagine he soon discovered I had not come to argue, and we had a friendly chat. He agreed with me, or appeared to do so, that soul-satisfaction was to be found alone in God. He had the shaven head of the Buddhist priest, was clad in a yellow robe, and had been ordained a few months. I invited him to visit me in Nuwara Eliya.

The occupant of the next hut I visited now bears the name of Rev. Bhaddiya, but was formerly known as Mr. Beck. He is, too, an American, and is, I should say, between forty and forty-five years of age. He appeared to be an educated, intelligent man. He told me he had been brought up in Texas and had lived there from sea level up to an altitude of eleven thousand feet. At first he seemed to receive us somewhat coldly but became quite friendly as he found we were not bent on controversy. He took the yellow robes six months ago and had, he said, been in Ceylon nearly a year.

Rev. Vappa was temporarily living in the house of the high priest—the only substantially built house in the settlement. It was a rather nice little house, slightly larger than the others. A striking picture of a human skull was the chief decoration of its one room. There was also a well-stocked bookcase. All the four monks had Pali books before them as I entered their huts. Pali, a dead language, is the sacred language of the Buddhists, and is a sister tongue to Sanskrit. Rev. Vappa is a German. He had, he said, traveled all over the continent of Europe, had spent a good deal of time in Russia, and also knew Lausanne well. He appeared to be second in seniority to the high priest and struck me as being an intellectual man.

Our party (my two friends and I) were greatly saddened by our interview with these poor men. We were united in the opinion that they feel keenly the loneliness of their situation and that none of them appeared to find the least joy in the life they were living. I hope friends will join us in very earnest prayer for them. Their presence in Ceylon as Buddhist priests is, I need not say, very harmful to the cause of Christ. I ask special prayer for one of the monks to whom I believe the Lord spoke during our visit. I had talked of the possibility of knowing God. "Many profess to know him," he said. "True," I answered, "but few have the blessedness of the experience. It costs something to get to really know him." "It costs more to give him up," he replied. This of course meant that he had adopted the blank atheism of Buddhism. I repeated, "It costs something to get to know God," and added, "but it is worth it all. To really know him, know him intimately—it is

I CANNOT GET BEYOND HIS LOVE

MRS. FRANK A. BEECK — GRANT COLFAX TULLAR

1. Wher-e'er I go the Sav-iour will go with me, It mat-ters not how dark and rough my way, With ten - der love He cir - cles all my jour - ney, I can - not get be - yond His lov - ing sway.
CHORUS.
I can-not get be-yond the cir - cle of His love, I can-not get be - yond the cir - cle of His love; His pres-ence goes be-fore me, And His love-light shineth o'er me, So I can-not get be - yond His love.

In sorrow's hour his tender love abideth,
For every woe he hath a soothing balm;
Mid every stormy tempest, wildly beating,
He whispers peace, and there is instant calm.

O peerless love, beyond all understanding!
And every soul this lasting love may choose!
Far-reaching love, so measureless, so boundless!
How strange that hearts can e'er such love refuse!

No powers, no depths, no towering heights above me,
Nor life, nor death, nor trials anywhere,
Can separate me from the love of Jesus,
Or keep me from his watchful, tender care.

the summum bonum, the highest good." His assumed atheism seemed scattered to the winds, and he said, deliberately and with emphasis, "I guess you know him." "By his grace I do," I added quietly.

Will each reader join in definite prayer for these deluded men? They cannot of course have known experimentally anything of the grace of God, and that they should have been led to seek spiritual light and consolation in Buddhism—the most utterly hopeless religion in the world—is sad beyond words. If earnest—and they appeared sincere—they are to be pitied. But why, oh, why were they not reached with the Gospel in the home lands? Surely, had God's professing people really lived Christ, and preached the Gospel in the power of the Holy Ghost, these poor misguided men would not be in a heathen country seeking peace of soul in a heathen religion, a religion that does not make for righteousness; a religion that so completely fails to satisfy its millions of adherents in these dark lands.

Will you cry to God on behalf of these white Buddhist monks? O people of America! in view of some of your sons being in this far Eastern country as Buddhists—heathen missionaries—do not let his cause in these heathen lands flag for lack of the needful money to prosecute it, or for lack of earnest, believing, constant prayer. I have just sent these four men my card and have written earnest letters to the two to whom the Lord seemed to speak. Pray God's blessing on these letters.

My heart is saddened by the fact that money is forthcoming from Christian countries to support Buddhist monks here, whilst in connection with our own mission scores of heathen villages are begging for the Gospel, and still we must turn a deaf ear to their cry. A. S. PAYNTER.

"Winter Suits Like New With Diamond Dyes"

"I think I ought to tell you for the benefit of others about my success with Diamond Dyes. Before I learned the magic of Diamond Dyes, I used to scrimp and worry every Spring and I all dread how to get new fresh clothes for my daughters and myself.

"I guess the two samples I enclose will show you that I don't waste much one. These are two Waists made I made one from a light tan serge and with a brown broadcloth dress and coat. I got two of the latest——and patterns, ripped the old suit and dress with coat up carefully and they are just like new.

Diamond Dyes

There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for wool or silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk now come in Blue envelopes. And, as heretofore, those for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods are in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics, and vegetable fibre fabrics.

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80% Cotton—as must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and naturally different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

Questions and Answers

N. H. B., Orangeburg, S. C. What is the meaning of the Bible saying: "Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days"?

The illustration is taken from the custom of sowing seed by casting it from the boats into the overflowing Nile, or in marshy ground. When the waters recede, the grain in the alluvial soil springs up. "Waters" expresses multitudes, whose seemingly hopeless character as recipients of charity may turn out better than we anticipate, so that our gift would prove at last not to have been thrown away. The day may be near when we ourselves may need the help of those whom we have bound to us by kindness. The passage you quote is from Eccles. 11: 1.

H. J. S., Racine, Wis. Please give numerical strength of the German army.

On a peace footing: 23,176 officers and 562,277 men, with 98,038 horses; the war footing strength is not officially given, but probably Germany could put almost three million trained officers and men into the field. She has 494 batteries, of which 47 are mounted.

C. W. S., Linden Heights, O. I notice in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 31 a sermon by Dr. Dixon, "Shall we know each other in heaven?" Judging from the sermon our condition in heaven will be similar to that which we enjoy here—a mother's love, a son's love, a wife's love and a love for such things as are necessary for our progress and existence here. I believe we shall know each other by our fruits, and if we enter into that divine love for one another which Christ had for us, the things of this world will become insignificant. What is your opinion?

Recognition in heaven is implied in many Scriptural passages. Christ himself taught it in the story of Lazarus and Dives, and in other illustrations in his ministry. David, speaking of his dead son, said: "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me." At the transfiguration Moses and Elias were discerned and recognized. Recognition being granted, the survival of our love and affection for those recognized follows. But after all, very much of what is written regarding the conditions of the future life is conjectural. Our present life is a training school for better things and we can look forward to a larger, nobler life hereafter, full of opportunities for grander service, and with experiences and enjoyments to correspond. As Paul tells us in I. Cor. 2: 9: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." Only as we are taught of the Spirit can we have foregleams of the occupations, joys and opportunities of the life hereafter.

J. J. R., Helena, Mont. How is a heavenly body photographed?

A telescope is pointed at the body so that the image of the latter is formed in its focus. A sensitized plate is placed in the focus and exposed for the necessary time, which may be only the fraction of a second or several hours. Unless the exposure is very brief it is necessary that the telescope be kept in motion so as to follow the object in its apparent diurnal course. When the exposure is completed the image is developed in the usual way.

J. C. McW., Eagleville, Mo. Please explain Rom. 8: 19, 21, also Mark 4: 12. In the Lord's prayer what is meant by "lead us not into temptation?"

1. See answer to P. A. P., Wadeville, N. C. 2. Jesus was here explaining why he employed parables in teaching. He did not begin to do so until his miracles were malignantly ascribed to Satanic agencies. His enemies saw his works, yet closed their eyes to their source and spiritual meaning. They heard his words, for he "spake as never man spake"; yet they were deaf to the life-giving message conveyed. They voluntarily refused to accept the Gospel and at length became morally incapable of doing so. 3. Some authorities read "suffer us not to be led into temptation."

Mrs. J. R., Redondo Beach, Calif. Can we feel, if we are true believers in Jesus and continue faithful, that if we steadfastly pray for the unconverted members of our households God will in some way draw them to himself and we may have the assurance that they will be saved?

The most definite Bible passage on this subject is I. John 5: 16: "If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life." The words of Paul in Acts 16: 31, "Thou shalt be saved, and thy house," probably mean simply that if all the members of the household believed they would be saved. But we have positive Scripture warrant for praying for our unconverted friends, and countless incidents from present day life and earlier times prove that many hearts have been won to Christ through prayer. The assurance may not always come that those for whom we pray will yield to God, but sometimes the assurance does come very definitely. Prayer for others should be personal, definite, earnest. S. D. Gordon in his Quiet Talks on Prayer takes the position that prayer for others, offered in the name of Jesus, has the effect of driving off evil influences from the persons for whom the prayer is being made. It projects the personal influence of the one who is praying to the one prayed for, and clears the spiritual atmosphere so that the voice of God can be heard and the power of God felt. Just as by talking to a person one may be able to persuade him to listen and yield to God, so by prayer one may influence another to submit himself to God. Most important of all is love. We must love ardently, steadily, those for whom we pray. Love will prevent us from doing things that would mar our influence over them or spoil their conception of the religious life. If our friends know that we love them deeply and constantly our words and prayers will have an almost irresistible power.

J. B. M., Ocala, Fla. What are the leading languages of the world, and by how many persons is each spoken?

English, spoken by about 120,000,000; German and Russian, each by about 80,000,000; French by over 50,000,000, Spanish by about 45,000,000, and Italian by some 35,000,000.

Subscriber, Elida, O. 1. Please explain I. Peter 3: 3, 4. 2. Also John 13: 4, 17.

1. The apostle, in these two verses, warned the Christian women against the abuse of outward ornament, not necessarily forbidding its use in a modest degree, but rather against excessive indulgence in such things when they became a needless hindrance to religion. He knew that even under costly attire there might be a humble and pious heart. At the same time, he points out that the true distinction or adornment is "a meek and quiet spirit"—a tranquil mind, undisturbed by the world's pleasures and vexations and not disposed to yield to its allurements. (See Prov. 31: 10, 31.) 2. Although Peter knew that the washing of feet was a hospitable Jewish custom, it was the act of a servant, and his heart rebelled against his Lord and Master performing the duty of a menial. Impulsive and loyal, he could not suffer himself to be so served by Jesus. His very refusal was evidence of his strong affection. But when the Lord had spoken, Peter realized the lesson of obedient service and that the truest humility and loyalty is to receive reverently the gifts of divine grace. Further, the alternative implied in the Master's answer (verse 8) caused Peter instantly to reverse his rash refusal, even if no other word had been spoken.

D. W., Tipton, Ind. In the tariff, what is meant by duty ad valorem?

Ad valorem means according to value and is a term denoting the method by which customs taxes are determined at a percentage of the value of the imported article at its place of export on the seller's oath and the appraiser's estimate.

C. B. G., Roaring Spring, Pa. What will be the future of the heathen who have never had the light of the Gospel?

The question of the salvation of the heathen has long been discussed. Early Christian writers held that the Holy Spirit exerted an influence upon the heathen, "who had no means of hearing the Gospel," through the channel of reason. Others have held that they are to be judged under natural law. God has his witnesses in all ages and in every land who, even though they may not have heard the Gospel, have lived according to their light. John Wesley wrote on this subject: "We have no authority from the Word of God to judge 'those that are without'," and he also wrote, toward the close of his ministry, "He that feareth God and worketh righteousness according to the light he has, is acceptable to God." See Rom. 4: 9. God, who will judge all, will not judge unjustly.

E. E. V., Britannia Beach, B. C., Canada. 1. Who gave Matthew, Mark, Luke and John the title of "Saint," and where does any church secure the right to make present-day "Saints"? Is it not wrong on the part of true Americans to acknowledge any "saints" such as Patrick, etc.? 2. In an argument, I contended that the keeping of any such saints' days by Americans is doing more to raise "racial barriers" or "nationalities" than anything else. I contend that when foreigners come here and America has prospered them, they should drop these old-country fads and customs and be Americans.

1. During the early days of the Christian Church, there was no authoritative use of the word "Saint" as a title. Wherever the word occurs in our New Testament, it simply means a "devout person," one who has been sanctified and specially consecrated. After the early Christian era, however, the martyrs and apostles were considered as having attained to the dignity of sainthood, although there was no formal canonization until the ninth century A.D., when the Church of Rome introduced formal canonization with special ceremonies.

ese two verses together emphasize the fact mercy and salvation are God's free gifts, while we are to make every effort and to every desire toward them—working out own salvation "with fear and trembling" t after all it is God's will and pleasure not only stirs us to such an attitude, but ts that which we do desire, and which we l never attain through our own efforts .

ler, Paterson, N. J. What is the relative strength of the Catholic and Protestant population of Ulster, the Irish province in which the great battle over home rule is now in progress?

what is known as the "heart of Ulster," h embraces the most populous parts of ion of Ireland, the Catholics constitute 4.1 cent. in Belfast, 31.6 in County Down, and per cent. in Antrim. The Episcopalians in Belfast 30.5, Presbyterians 33.71, hodists 6.2, and other denominations 50.3. se figures are taken from a recent religious us and show the overwhelming preponder- e of Protestants in the whole province.

der, New London, Ia. 1. Please explain II. Cor. 3: 14. 2. What law is referred to in Heb. 7: 19? 3. Explain Gal. 3: 23. What law was it? 4. Explain Gal. 5: 4, 18. 5. What commandments are referred to in I. John 5: 3? 6. What commandments should one follow to have eternal life? Does Matt. 19: 17-21 answer this?

his careful letter bears the marks of being written by one who is not thoroughly acquainted with the principles of the Protestant faith; but so many, even of those who have been most carefully trained in that belief, are in danger of forgetting the simplicity of the doctrine of salvation by faith that it will be worth while to make a special study of those passages. 1. The Jews are said to have a veil over their hearts, because they have allowed their allegiance to the old dispensation to keep them from believing Christ. It is he who brings the veil. The Jews let the old ceremonial law remain as a veil between themselves and the light of God which is in Christ. 2. The Mosaic law. There was nothing in the commandments themselves which had power to bring souls to spiritual perfection. 3. This again is the Mosaic law. The law convicted men of sin and challenged them to try to do right. The failure of a man to keep the law makes him ready and willing to yield to a new principle, the principle of faith in Jesus. And this faith in Jesus gives him the power to be good, for which he was formerly striving. The old law was a bondage; faith is a life. 4. If, after finding salvation by faith, one gives it up and begins again to try to be good in his own strength, "Christ becomes of no effect" to him. That is, he ceases to take advantage of Christ's sacrifice and Christ's strength in going back to the old plan of trying to save himself by works. 5. All of them. None of God's commandments can be said to be grievous. But John is doubtless thinking here of the simplicity of the Christian life, a life freed from the old ceremonial law, and bound by no requirements except the requirement of loving God with all the heart and loving and serving our neighbor in Christ's strength. 6. Before Christ died there was no other way of finding eternal life than by keeping the law. But since he has died we are saved by faith in him. The law Christ quotes here was the fundamental moral law. Every one must keep that law. Faith in Christ gives us the power to keep it. It is only the ceremonial part of the law that we are exempted from in the new dispensation. The answers to your other questions will appear in our next issue.

Rev. A. J. Arendt (Lutheran), Beaver Dam, Wis. You certainly strike on some very timely subjects in the issue I received as a sample copy. For instance, "Our Children and the Bible." Another thing that is woefully neglected at the present time is prayer. We have the divine command of Christ to pray at all times, unceasingly. The alarming prevalence of superficial Christianity is undoubtedly due to the fact that this command is being more and more disregarded. In view of this, why not devote part of your paper to a department superscribed "Jesus Loves to Answer Prayer"? It seems to me that, aside from the fact that it would be interesting, it would be the means of producing inestimable good.

There is already a department in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD devoted to "Answered Prayers." We receive every week a large number of such communications, and we are always glad to welcome contributions of this character from our readers. We heartily agree with Pastor Arendt that prayer is too much neglected at the present time.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. G. L. R., Los Angeles, Calif. 1. We have sent your letter to the person you mention. 2. There are, unfortunately, professors in our theological schools who are believers in the destructive Higher Criticism, and those you mention probably belong to this class.

C. F., Detroit, Mich. It is a very hard question and one in which we would not undertake to advise. Indeed, if the woman has complied with the law in other respects, we think her first duty should be to her children. It is clearly a case for the individual conscience.

W. C. S., Cayucos, Calif. The refusal of a church member to attend services or contribute to the support of the church because he "does not like the minister," is a weakness in human nature by no means uncommon. Not knowing the particulars, however, we cannot discuss the case in question.

W. A. R., Atwood, Ind. 1. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is not a political paper in any sense, and consequently cannot advise. Every man should vote as his conscience and his sense of duty to the nation and the community may direct him. 2. There is no standard of comparison between the races mentioned. 3. The Unitarians do not accept Christ as divine.

J. ., Oxford, O. 1. The book of Job, as we have already stated, is a spiritual allegory. See discussed in a recent issue in THE MAIL-BAG. As we are told that "multitudes believed on him," we are justified in accepting it as an evidence of the work of the Spirit. 3. Though criminals have been convicted and punished on their own supported confession in many cases, it is the rule in modern law not to do so, unless the confession can be fairly substantiated.

C. P. M., Detroit, Mich., suggests the publication of the following question: "When have you heard your pastor preach a sermon which you believe would have been the means of your conversion, had you not already been born again?" It is a good question, with a strong, personal note, and we print it with pleasure, and shall be glad to hear what THE MAIL-BAG readers have to report concerning it. C. P. M. adds: "There is a great decline in the spiritual status of our churches. Even among those who still have a call to come to Christ, the call is too often only a few words at the close. It seems to me that such a question might lead pastor and layman to think."

Have You Ever Eaten Beans in Boston Town?

—Home-Baked in a real oven—in the good New England way?

And has your appetite a memory?

Well, just sit down to a dish of Heinz Baked Beans—served smoking hot—close your eyes, and you'll be back again in Boston.

For Heinz Baked Beans are baked in ovens with dry heat—they are like the beans from the famous New England bean-pots—not boiled or steamed like most canned beans.

Heinz Baked Beans

are so baked that the heat gets all through them—so that every drop of excess moisture is driven out—only the pure nutriment and the flavor of their rich tomato sauce remains.

That's the why of their delicious aroma that tempts the laggard appetite.

When buying beans, see that the word "Baked" is on the lable. The government forbids its use when beans are not baked. You will find the word "Baked" on every tin of Heinz Beans.

There are four kinds of Heinz Baked Beans:

Heinz Baked Beans with Pork and Tomato Sauce.

Heinz Baked Pork and Beans without Tomato Sauce—Boston Style.

Heinz Baked Beans in Tomato Sauce without pork. (Vegetarian).

Heinz Baked Red Kidney Beans.

WELL-KNOWN WOMEN IN PUBLIC LIFE

CULTURED women trained in Christian homes are the ones who are taking the lead in organized movements for the betterment of many phases of our civic and national life. The new president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, Mrs. Percy V. Pennybacker, of Austin, Texas, is a minister's daughter. She was Miss Anna J. Hardwicke, born in Petersburg, Va., and her father was the Rev. J. B. Hardwicke, a zealous and devoted minister of the Gospel. The training of the Christian home laid the sure foundation of her broad culture and fine womanly qualities. All her work has been marked by the earnestness and perseverance of the serious and high-minded individual who holds life as a trust and devotes it to community service.

Mrs. Anna Hardwicke Pennybacker

Mrs. Pennybacker is well known in the educational circles of the South. For fourteen years, both before and after her marriage, she was in public educational work, ten years being spent as principal of a Texas high school. She exercised her literary ability in writing a history of Texas, which was adopted by law as the textbook for the public schools, and she has also written many articles for educational publications. In her work as an educator, she ever had in mind the making of a life, and her impression upon her students was one of serious purpose and highest aspiration.

Left a widow with three children, Mrs. Pennybacker has fulfilled the duties of both parents in the rearing and training of her family; and "her children rise up and call her blessed."

Organized work in various forms, religious and secular, has called her and claims her best. She formed the first woman's club in Texas twenty-five years ago and gave it the impulse of her fine mind and literary ability. She recently became president of the State Federation and treasurer of the General Federation of Women's Clubs. As chairman of the Field Committee for the Endowment Fund, she has been the chief factor this year in raising a $100,000 endowment for the General Federation, which will give the organization a much-needed income for promoting and carrying on its important work. Among the endeavors listed are work for universal peace; for social purity; for a national bureau of health; for better care of the unfortunate; the conservation of our great natural resources; rural betterment; civil service reform; the training of women for citizenship; and the correlation of social and industrial activities to home-making.

A HIGHLY cultured Christian woman, public official, and philanthropist is Mrs. C. E. Lees, of Oldham, England, who has the distinction of being second woman mayor in England. She successfully contested Hollinwood Ward, Oldham, as the Liberal candidate in a municipal by-election in 1907; and the following year was returned without opposition, being nominated by both parties. In appreciation of her services to the town she was given the freedom of the borough, being the first freeman to obtain the honor. Last year Oldham made her its mayor.

Mrs. Lees is now at the vantage point of seventy years, having been born at Carr Hill, Massley, England, in 1842. Her father was the late John Buckley and her husband the late Charles E. Lees, a well-to-do manufacturer of Oldham. One of her two daughters is the wife of the Rev. Charles Prodgers, vicar of Elvaston, Derbyshire; the other, who is a member of the Oldham Board of Education, discharged the social duties which usually devolve upon the "mayoress" during her mother's term of office.

For the last twenty years, Mrs. Lees has been active in public work. The Oldham Nursing Association claims her as its honorary secretary; she is also president of the Oldham Branch of the National Union of Women Workers; governor of Hulme Grammar School; president of the Beautiful Oldham Society; a member of the city education committee; chairman of the special schools committee; a member of the Council of the Royal Manchester College of Music, and of the court of the Manchester University. URCE OF LIFE ABUNDANT

BY DR. O. S. MARDEN

HERE is surely something wrong when multitudes of the sons and daughters of the King of kings, who have inherll the good things of the uni- starve on the very shores of the n of plenty, of opulence unspeakwhich flows past their very doors hich carries infinite supply.

's children were not made to l but to aspire; to look up, not They were not made to pinch in poverty, but for larger, er things. Nothing is too good e children of our Heavenly Fa- nothing too beautiful for human s; nothing too magnificent for us oy. It is the narrow- of our thought that mited us. If we had r and grander concep- of life we should at- grander things; we made in God's image we are his children; is his children we are of all that is his, all s beautiful and useful e universe. The very g of the mind open d all the good things e world, expecting and ciating them, will have thing to do with our ning them.

ere is nothing which uman race lacks so much as unioned, implicit confidence in the Source of all supply. We to stand in the same relation to infinite Source of things as the does to its parents. The child not say, "I do not dare eat this for fear that I may not get any " It takes everything with ab- confidence and assurance that ts needs will be supplied, that is plenty more where these s came from.

do not have half good enough ons of our possibilities; do not t half enough of ourselves; we t demand half enough, hence the erness, the stinginess of what we lly get. We do not demand the dance which belongs to us; hence eanness, the lack of fulness, the pleteness of our lives. We do lemand royally enough. We are nt with too little of the things while. It was intended that we d live the abundant life, that we d have plenty of everything that od for us. No one was meant to n poverty and wretchedness.

ppose a boy should try to become wyer without expecting to be ad- ed to the bar, or while really be- g that he would never amount to hing as a lawyer. He would fail. end to get what we expect, and if expect nothing, we get nothing. stream cannot rise higher than ountain-head; no one can become perous when he expects or half cts to remain poor.

e man who is bound to win be- s he is going to be prosperous; he s out with the understanding himself that he is going to be a essful man, a winner and not a . He does not say to himself all time, "What's the use? The t business combinations are swal- g up the chances. Before long multitude will have to work for ew. I do not believe I shall ever nything more than make just a living in a very humble way. I never have a home and the gs that other people have. I am ned to be poor and a nobody." A will never make progress with ideals. Everybody ought to stand t with face towards the sun of and prosperity. Success and iness are the inalienable rights very human being. Let your be those of plenty, of abun- e. Let us hold the thought that is our great supply; that if we keep in tune, in close touch with so that we can feel our at-one- ness with him, the great Source of all supply, abundance will flow to us and we shall never again know want.

Lack and want do not fit man's divine nature. The trouble with us is that we do not have half enough faith in the good that is in store for us. We do not dare fling out our whole souls' desire to follow the leading of our divine hunger and ask without stint for the abundance that is our birthright. We ask little things, and we expect little things, pinching our desires and limiting our supply. Not daring to ask to the full of our souls' desire, we do not open our minds sufficiently to allow a great inflow of good things. We do not fling out our souls' desire with that abundant faith which trusts implicitly and which receives accordingly.

We are not dealing with a Creator who is impoverished by granting our requests. It is his nature to give, to flood us with our hearts' desire. He does not have less because we ask much. The rose does not ask the sun for only a tiny bit of its light and heat, for it is the sun's nature to throw it out to everything which will absorb it and drink it in. The candle loses nothing of its light by lighting another candle. We do not lose but increase our capacity for friendship by being friendly, by giving abundantly of our love.

One of the greatest evils of the world is the belief in the necessity of poverty. Most people have a strong conviction that some must necessarily be poor; that they were made to be poor. But there was no poverty, no want, no lack, in the Creator's plan for man. There need not be a poor person on the planet. The earth is full of resources which we have scarcely touched. The fact is, we live in our own worlds, we are creations of our own thought. Each builds his own world by his thought habit.

Many people keep themselves poor by the slavish fear of poverty, allowing themselves to dwell upon the possibility of coming to want, of not having enough to live upon. The minds of the children in such families are saturated with the fear of poverty; they hear of it from morning till night. They see poverty-stricken conditions everywhere. They hear everybody talking about limitation, lack. Everything around them suggests poverty. Is it any wonder that children, brought up in such an atmosphere, should repeat the poverty-stricken conditions of their parents and environment?

Did you ever think that the terror of poverty, the constant worry about making ends meet, the fear of that awful "rainy day" not only make you unhappy, but actually tends to bring about the conditions that disqualify you from making real progress?

True prosperity is the inward consciousness of spiritual opulence, wholeness, completeness; the consciousness of oneness with the divine Source of abundance and infinite supply; the consciousness of possessing an abundance of all that is good for us in material things, and a personality of character which no disaster on land or sea can destroy. Opulence, in the larger sense in which we use it, is everything that is good for us, abundance of all that is beautiful in life, uplifting and inspiring; abundance of all that is sublime and magnificent. It is everything that will enrich the personality, the experience, the spiritual life.

THE Maker of the tree made me.
How close we are of kin!
Thou hadst no need of Calvary,
But I knew sin.

The Howard Watch

The American business man, it is said, never writes when he can "wire." He sends 500,000 telegrams every working day, keeping fifty-nine thousand offices busy and nearly two million miles of wire.

It is an index of the national spirit of "putting the thing across" —getting it done. The same spirit of punctuality and practical time-saving that leads so many men to select the HOWARD Watch.

Whether a man realizes it or not —his working activities don't escape being judged by HOWARD standards. There are HOWARD Watches in the pockets of his superiors and his associates—and probably some of his subordinates.

Not every HOWARD owner is a moneyed man, by any means. The most eager purchasers of HOWARDS are the earnest young fellows who have to strain a point to get one—like any other special effort they make to get ahead.

Any way you look at it, to the man who really cares, a HOWARD Watch is always worth what he pays for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Admiral Sigsbee has written a little book, "The Log of the HOWARD Watch," giving the record of his own HOWARD in the U. S. Navy. You'll enjoy it. Drop us a post-card, Dept. W, and we'll send you a copy.

AIN'T IT FINE TO-DAY?

SURE, this world is full of trouble—
I ain't said it ain't.
Me! I've had enough an' double
Reason for complaint.
Rain an' storm have come to fret me,
Skies were often gray;
Thorns and brambles have beset me
On the road—but, say,
Ain't it fine to-day!

What's the use of always weepin',
Makin' trouble last?
What's the use of always keepin'
Thinkin' of the past?
Each must have his tribulation,
Water with his wine,
Life, it ain't no celebration.
Trouble? I've had mine—
But to-day is fine!

It's to-day that I am livin',
Not a month ago:
Havin', losin', takin', givin',
As time wills it so.
Yesterday a cloud of sorrow
Fell across the way;
It may rain again to-morrow,
It may rain—but, say,
Ain't it fine to-day! —Selected.

room for them. The birds of peace and contentment and joy and praise will fly in fast enough if we only invite Jesus Christ, and set the windows of our souls open for his coming. Every time that we perform a living Christ-like service to the poor, or wronged, or neglected, another canary flies back to our window." But rather we would compare peace with the gentle dove, which does not burst forth into rapturous song, but breathes forth in cooing tones the quiet gentleness of its nature.

We may all have the dove of peace abiding in our hearts, and may say with the apostle Paul: "I have learned in whatever state I am, therewith to be content." Dr. Cuyler has said: "Some of the happiest people I have known are in the by-ways of life, and no fine equipage ever halts at their humble doors. I used to climb up quite often to a garret in order to catch an ever-bright gleam of heaven's sunshine from an aged blind woman, who could not see the little grandchild who read the Bible to her. She dwelt in perpetual night. But into her soul shone the perpetual light of her Saviour's countenance. Mighty in the Scriptures, she fed on angel's food, and her dingy garret was another Patmos.

"So lived she on, for God was kind,
And well she knew in heaven no eye is blind."

But joy in the heart, which proceeds from the Holy Spirit, is the highest blessedness. A joyous Christian is an honor to the religion which he professes. He will do more than many sermons to lead many people to be Christians.

One day several ministers were dining together at a hospitable home; many witty things were said, and some humorous stories were told; a maid who was waiting on the table several times went out into the entry to have a good laugh all by herself. A few days after the hostess said to her pastor: "Have you heard that our Katy is converted?" "Who did you say?" he asked. "Why, our waiting maid," she replied. "What was it that awakened her and led her to Christ?" he asked. "Well," replied the lady, "you may remember that she waited on the table the day the ministers dined here, and she afterwards told me that she never had heard so much laughing without any swearing. She had served tables at an inn before coming to us, and had been accustomed to hear men jest and swear over their cups, and so she had become accustomed to believe that cheerfulness could not be absolutely pure and blameless."

It is said of the great composer, Haydn, that once, being asked why his church music was almost always of an animating, cheerful description, he replied: "I can not make it otherwise. I write according to the thoughts I feel; when I think upon God, my heart is so full of joy that notes dance and leap from my pen; and since God has given me a cheerful heart, it will be easily forgiven me that I serve him with a cheerful spirit."

"The wild joy of living," so-called, is not the joy that satisfies an immortal spirit. Coleridge has said: "In the deepest night of sorrow God gives us so much to be thankful for that we need never cease our singing. With all our wisdom and foresight we can take a lesson in gladness and gratitude from the happy bird that sings all night as if the day were not long enough to tell its joy."

[In the Sunday School Lesson of August 7, credit was given to Lord Lytton as being the author of the poem, "There is no Death." The poem came into our possession with that name attached. We are now convinced that the author is Mr. J. L. McCreery of Iowa, who wrote it in 1859, and published it in the Delaware County Journal.]

WOMEN SOLDIERS

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD there appeared an account of certain women soldiers. As a matter of interest, especially to your host of Pennsylvania readers, here is a transcript of a record in Vol. IV of Bates' History of Pennsylvania Volunteers: On page 139, linked by a bracket, are these names and record: "Frank Mayne — Frances Day, Sergeant. Enlisted August 9, 1862. Deserted August 24, 1862. Subsequently killed in battle. See note page 127." Said note reads as follows:

"A melancholy but romantic incident which occurred at this time, is thus related by Judge Rowe in his Sketch of the Regiment: 'Before we follow the regiment from Washington, a bit of romance connected with its history is to be chronicled. William Fitzpatrick of Western Virginia loved or was loved by Frances Day. Fitzpatrick enlisted in Company F, from Juniata County, and went to the war with the 126th Regiment. In a short time he fell ill, and on the 24th of August, 1862, whilst the regiment lay at Cloud's Mills, he died in the hospital at Alexandria. On the day he died, Frank Mayne, a sergeant of Company F, unaccountably deserted. When he enlisted he was a stranger to all the men of that company, but in a few days he had so ingratiated himself with all his comrades and officers as to be promoted to sergeant. He was not heard of any more while the regiment remained in service. But long after, in the far West, a soldier, wounded badly in a great battle, could not conceal her sex, and Frances Day then told how she had followed Fitzpatrick into the army, and became herself a soldier and sergeant in the 126th Pennsylvania Volunteers; of her desertion upon her lover's death, and the abandon and despair which led her again to seek the ranks of the army. To verify her story letters were written to the officers of Company F, at Mifflintown, and thus the mystery of the sergeant's desertion was dispelled.'" C. R. GEARHART.

Heaven Is Not Reached at a Single Bound

HEAVEN is not reached at a single bound,
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round.

I count this thing to be grandly true:
That a noble deed is a step toward God,
Lifting the soul from the common clod
To a purer air and a broader view.

FOR ALL HALLOWE'EN

ARLY in October is none too soon to prepare for an All Hallowe'en frolic. Ever so many school societies and Sunday-school bands have written to the Corner asking for suggestions for all Hallowe'en. So we have put a Hallowe'en party in the form of a story-making affair, though it can easily be carried out as a frolic pure and simple by leaving the money-making part out of it and substituting other prizes and costumes.

As to it that the rooms where the party is to be given are liberally festooned with orange and black cheesecloth and/or crêpe paper and invitingly decked by no other means than an open fire and jack-o'-lamps, large and small, carefully and artistically placed.

Plenty of large and tempting red apples should hang just out of reach on long strings stretched across the room in several directions. One of the funniest sights imaginable is to see twenty-five or thirty people, each trying to take a bite out of an apple hanging from a string.

Pretty maids dressed as witches in robes of yellow and black cheesecloth or crêpe paper, and topped with a witch's copiæ cap, should go about among the guests with little slips of paper urging the guests to "try to bite an apple, please, five cents a try." Two pretty girls should go around crying out "Apple bobs for sale. Come buy, come buy," and pointing the way to tubs three-quarters full of water where many rosy apples float. Apple-bobbing is sure to be popular, and groups of enthusiasts will soon be gathering about awaiting their turn. A penny is added to the zest of apple-bobbing if pressed into each apple before it is a bean, a grain of corn, or a penny.

The old game of Apple-Bob played by our great grandmothers was played in this way: If you secure an apple with a bean in it, "Yours will be a fair life, with peace and plenty and a pretty wife." The grain of corn indicates that you will marry a professional man, or be one if you are a boy, and the button points to a life of single blessedness.

Guess Me, Please

Have a little stand in the corner named "Guess Me, Please," in letters made of cranberries or popcorn, and a delightful little witch could ask people to buy from her a privilege to guess the number of grapes on a branch; of grains on an ear of corn; of beans in a bag of chestnuts, or of peas in a basket heaped with the beautiful rosy fruit. A large chrysanthemum might invite you to guess the number of petals in its shaggy head, or an autumn rose ticketed "The Last Rose of Summer" could invitingly suggest that you guess the number of its unfallen rose leaves. Nice prizes for nearest guessers are a deep-dish pumpkin pie, or a dozen corn muffins all brown and tempting in a new tin box and plenty of tissue paper for the one guessing nearest the number of kernels on the ear of corn; or a jar of grape preserves or a tumbler of rich jelly for the lucky guesser of the bunch of grapes. A basket of chestnuts, a peck of apples, a dozen ears of popcorn would also be nice for prizes.

A simple and funny magic lantern entertainment for twenty-five cents a ticket is sure to be a popular feature, and a very nice Hallowe'en supper can be served for fifty cents a plate.

The Feature of the Evening—Games After Supper

THE room in which the games are to be played should be emptied of all furniture except chairs. A Hallowe'en witch dressed like the others should start the game-ball rolling by announcing: "Blindfolders may be bought in the hall for five cents apiece." Everybody, of course, will buy a blindfolder, which consists of a folded strip of white muslin large enough to encircle the head. At a signal from the piano, when everybody is good and ready, a big game of Blind Man's Buff should begin. At the end of fifteen or twenty minutes the hostess witch must announce, "Tickets to Jerusalem, Jerusalem, Jerusalem! Who will buy tickets to Jerusalem, five cents apiece?" A long line of chairs should be arranged alternately down the center of the room, while everybody joins in the good old game, Going to Jerusalem, or Musical Chair. This is great fun if the players dress in sheets and pillow cases and march to solemn music. Puss in the Corner, Hide the Slipper, Cobbler, Cobbler, Round and Round the Mulberry Bush, Alphabet, Jingles, London Bridge, Forfeits, How Many Miles to Babylon, Dumb Crambo, Charades, The Muffin Man, Stage Coach, Still Pond No More Moving, Last Couple Out, and as many more of the good old-fashioned games as there is time for. A good ghost story that ends happily is always a nice finale to a Hallowe'en frolic.

Our Prize Offer

The Cozy Corner prizes will be ready by October 7, and all boys and girls who have sent in names of their friends will receive one.

FOR OUR LITTLE PEOPLE

THE SANDMAN

The rosy clouds float overhead;
The sun is going down:
Now the Sandman's gentle tread
Comes stealing through the town.

He smiles to see the eyelids close
Above the happy eyes:
Every child right well he knows:
The he is very wise!

When you hear the Sandman's song
And through the twilight sweet,
Are you do not keep him long
Waiting on the street.

SLEEP, BABY, SLEEP

Lie softly down, dear little head,
Rest quiet, busy hands,
Till by your bed, his good-night said,
He strews the shining sands.

Blue eyes, gray eyes, black eyes and brown,
As shuts the rose, they softly close, when he goes through the town.

THE METHODISTS AND THE CATHOLICS

IN ITS issue of September 12, the Christian Advocate of New York, in an article of remarkable force and clearness, thus defined the attitude of the Methodist Church in America on the Roman Catholic question:

"The Methodists propose to make a clear distinction between the Roman Church as a religious body, dedicated to the proclamation of the Gospel of the crucified One, and the politico-ecclesiastical institution which under the same name asserts its right to the temporal as well as the spiritual sovereignty of the world. They see no necessary connection between the vital piety of multitudes of Romanists and the arrogant claims of the Papacy.

"The Methodists propose to continue exposing the fallacy that Rome alone has "the keys" and the authority to "bind and loose." They will go on affirming one Holy Catholic Church, the body of Christ, with many members, a goodly fellowship of Greeks, Romanists, Armenians, Copts, Protestants, Anglicans and whatever other artificial labeling may be discovered among them, one in spirit but various in outward expression. Neither badges nor shibboleths, neither banners nor symbols, will be reckoned as tests of truth. Fidelity to the plain meaning of the Holy Scriptures and the obvious teachings of Jesus Christ will constitute their criteria for discriminating the chaff from the wheat. They will recognize no schism but separation from Christ. Those who are in spiritual fellowship with him are of the Holy Catholic Church.

"The Methodists will persist in expressing, as they did at the late General Conference of one branch of their denomination, 'the deepest sympathy with as well as love toward the priests and people within the Greek and Roman Catholic Churches who are working toward a more spiritual interpretation of the Christian faith.' There are many such, and though they are a trouble to the politico-ecclesiastical machine, and are increasing everywhere in strength and vexatiousness, they will be recognized by Rome herself in the long run as the providential means by which the Church was saved from the corruptions which brought on the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century.

"The Methodists will continue to lay bare the record of political Romanism in those countries where she has been dominant, both as an admonition to liberty-loving people and as a justification of Protestant missions in so-called Catholic nations. They will point to the history of Spain, Italy and France, they will recall the struggles of Holland, the debasement of the Philippines, and the depravity of South America and Mexico, and only ask that the common sense of mankind be permitted to judge Rome by the results of an impartial examination of these records. Methodists are simply anxious that what has occurred in other lands and at other times shall not be reproduced in America at any time. The writer in the Catholic World, to whom we are making response, declared that Romanists are "destined to win this country by sheer force of religious superiority." If they could obtain that coveted prize by such a spiritual preeminence no broad-minded man in the Christian Church would object. Unfortunately Rome hopes for conquest by carnal as well as spiritual methods. It is futile for her defenders, like the writer in the Catholic World, to denounce as lies the accusations of those who charge her with political intrigues. 'The Church will never come to its own until there are more Catholics in Congress,' says Archbishop Ireland. 'It is our duty to direct every individual, and also the rulers in public, social and political affairs, . . . to make of the United States, according to a dream that is no longer visionary, the first Catholic nation of the world,' declares Pius X in an allocution. 'A little practice of practical Catholicity now in their political relations will be an excellent preparation for the fight that is prophesied by events,' says the Catholic Universe of Cleveland, O., concerning what is called 'the great party of Catholic voters.' 'Tell us we are Catholics first and Americans or English afterward; of course we are,' says a priest in a sermon reported in the Western Watchman, a Romanist paper. 'It is one of vital importance to the three American cardinals,' says Cardinal Farley of Major Butt's mission to Rome. What folly in the face of such deliverances to pretend that only a spiritual propaganda is contemplated by political Rome!"

Catholics and the Schools of Lowell

UP TO about a year ago, the governing power of Lowell consisted of a mayor, a board of aldermen and a common council, but this year we are under the commission form of government, which consists of five men and a school committee of five. Of the five commissioners at least three are Catholics, and at least four of the five men on the school board are Catholics. Up to the present year our school board has been largely made up of Protestants; but this year the women of the city had an opportunity to vote, and we feel that it was largely due to this fact that so many of the Catholics got into office. Simply for the reason that the Catholic women turned out in much larger numbers than the Protestants. Unless the complexion of our school board is changed, eventually the Catholic teachers will dominate our public schools.

Papal Defiance of Law

SEVERAL illegal public processions were organized last month by the Romanists, the most noteworthy being from the Roman Catholic Cathedral in Southwark on the evening of June 10, when the Host was carried into the Lambeth Road by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Southwark. It is very evident that the organizers of this illegal procession, which was conducted in contravention of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829, feared lest the authorities might stop it, or that a public Protestant protest might be made, for they kept their object a close secret until the last moment, when they emerged, like a lot of guilty schoolboys breaking into an orchard, from the doors of St. George's Roman Catholic Cathedral, carrying their wafer-god beneath a gaudy golden canopy. The Catholic Times says: "The fact that the Sacred Host was to be carried had not been made public." The Tablet (Catholic) states: "And then came the surprise of the gathering. Known only to a few, it had been decided to carry the Blessed Sacrament in procession into the public highway." This secrecy on the part of the organizers shows that they were fully aware of the illegality of their action.—Protestant Observer, London, July, 1912.

Catholic Federation

THE Federation of Catholic Societies is only in its infancy, and yet it has accomplished results that are amazing in proportion to the difficulties with which it had to contend. Instituted as a means of Catholic defense, it has met many old-standing forms of aggression and brought them to silence. It has placed the Catholic position prominently before the general public, and thus served to dissipate many long-standing prejudices. It has helped to show the Catholic people themselves their own important position as citizens of the country and thus aroused in them a sense of their rights and a determination to maintain them.—Boston Pilot, August 24.

TORIES OF ANSWERED PRAYER

ON SATURDAY, the 8th, I shall be, if I live, eighty-four years old. Passing through many severe trials, I have n brought through by prayer from tenth year. My prayers have al- ys been answered when they have n from a pure desire. Jesus said, hat things soever ye desire, when pray, believe that ye have received m and ye shall have them.' I have d seventy-four years to learn the ts that God hears and answers all ayers where there is need, and that ayer must be in faith. The more life is lengthened my faith grows onger."

These sentences are taken from a ter written by Mr. J. S. Perkins, of st Dixfield, Me. Seventy-four years living the life of faith is an inspir- record. Here is another:

"I feel it my duty as well as a pleas- e to speak of the goodness of my avenly Father in answering prayer through my life. Am now ninety- years of age." Such is the testi- ny of Mrs. S. Y. Egan, who writes om San Diego, Calif.

The "Answered Prayer" letters re- ved at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ce make a most impressive testimo- il to the place and power of prayer the life of the American people. Ac- panying letters like those quoted ove, written by aged saints who ve proved through a long life the acy of prayer, come words from ung and middle-aged Christians o are making God their partner d friend in the affairs of life. The ters come pouring in from all quar- s of the continent, giving incident on incident in which the power and e of God have been manifested in swer to prayer.

There is a story of heartbreak in is letter, heartbreak that has given ace to joy: "God answered my ayer. He sent my boy home." L. H., of Natrona, Pa., writes: "My other, who was ill unto death, was aled through prayer, and another other was brought into the kingdom the prayer of God's people." There ems something of the air of Beth- y about that letter. One hears the ho of the sad words: "Lord, if thou dst been here my brother had not ed," and the cheering assurance: hy brother shall rise again."

The healing of the seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain.
We touch him, in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again.

In this letter from Texas there are ggestions of another sad story ven a happy ending through prayer: wish to acknowledge, through your swered prayer column, that God in s infinite mercy and wisdom has re- ored a dear one to health and ought news of one supposed to be ad." Here is another practical ayer that has been answered. Miss S., of Detroit, Mich., writes: "I ish to have it published that my ayer for help from God to get my ucation has been answered." In e letter of a lady of Washington, C., is a phrase that dissatisfied ople everywhere would do well to nder. Every one is wishing for ppiness. We are apt to forget that od wants us to be happy, even more an we can want happiness our- lves. And the place to find happi- ss is in prayer. This lady writes: wish to acknowledge that the heav- ly Father has answered a prayer at has made me very happy." We ed often the warning of the old- shioned hymn:

Oh, what peace we often forfeit;
Oh, what needless pains we bear:
All because we do not carry
Everything to God in prayer!

Letters telling of answered prayers ve also been received from:

$13,400.31 on the Side

Mr. F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H., in the past twenty-five years has cleared $13,400.31 from hens. This is a remarkable record, when it is known that Mr. Dunlap is employed ten hours a day in a store and all the time he has to put in with his hens is what he can get morning, noon and night. This $13,400.31 was all made on the side. Nor does Mr. Dunlap get fancy prices for what he has to sell. He ships to Boston, and takes current quotations from the commission men there. Mr. Dunlap began in 1887 with twenty hens. In 1910 his poultry profits figured out $1188.05—and this is all on the side. Mr. Dunlap's hens have bought him a beautiful home, purchased a horse and carriage, sent three boys to school and college, besides saving something for a rainy day. Can others do equally well?" Sure thing," says Mr. Dunlap, "if they will wear out the soles of their shoes faster than they do the seat of their chair." The story of Mr. Dunlap's success and his methods is told in the book, "Side-Line Poultry-Keeping," and it is only one out of a score of things to set the blood tingling and make one resolve to get next to the $600,000,000 spent in the United States each year for poultry and eggs.

$1,009.31 R. A. Richardson of Haverhill, Mass., a shoe cutter, made his hens pay him $1,009.31 in 1910, and kept working at the bench at the same time. How he did it is told in "Side-Line Poultry-Keeping."

"SIDE-LINE POULTRY-KEEPING"

is the name of a new book by the author of "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen," the most popular poultry book ever printed. "Side Line Poultry-Keeping" deals with the business side of poultry keeping as the other dealt with egg production. It tells how to make poultry keeping pay. It describes the methods by which F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H., makes over $1000 a year from eggs, devoting not over two hours a day to his hens. Not a detail left out. The book tells how to make a start, what breeds pay, how, when and where to buy a farm, how to make a living from the first, describes the most wonderful breeding system in the world, tells how to build the most economical poultry houses and trap nests, how to feed for best results, describes a feed that can be made for 15 cents a bushel and is without a peer for producing eggs, how to make money with pigeons, ducks and market gardening, how to buy and sell to advantage, how to pick out the laying hens, how to put down eggs so that they will keep a year, etc.

Invaluable to every man who wishes to make money on the side, and indispensable to the man who is looking forward to the free, independent healthful life of the poultry farm. The Panhandle of Idaho

Has Greatly Diversified Land, climate, altitude and products. It is a country to suit all comers. On one farm of 160 acres was grown a total of 112 different varieties of products!

¶ The NORTHERN PACIFIC has a net-work of railroads in the Inland Empire of Washington and Idaho. Radiating from Spokane are lines in almost all directions. With its frequent freight and passenger service, the Northern Pacific serves to keep all parts of this great interior Empire in close touch with the country's markets.

¶ OPPORTUNITIES are innumerable in the Inland Empire—not only to acquire valuable and productive farming lands, but also in the many growing cities and towns along the Northern Pacific Railway.

¶ Ask for our "Opportunities" book which describes the Northern Pacific points where "opportunities" exist in the Panhandle of Idaho.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO HOMESTEADERS:

¶ Recent revision of homestead law reduces period of required residence from 5 to 3 years and allows 5 months absence each year. Write quick for list of homestead lands adjacent to Northern Pacific, and full particulars.

¶ The soil of Northern Idaho is of volcanic origin—very deep, warm and made up of the richest ingredients.

¶ All the cereals, corn, potatoes and other vegetables, fruits and grasses grow in abundance.

¶ The Nez Perce and Camas Prairie Country is famous for its production of grain, for its blooded cattle, and is particularly well adapted to dairying, hog raising and general farming.

¶ The Lewiston-Clarkston region, with its five and ten acre irrigated orchards and vineyards and its free Horticultural School, is very attractive to homeseekers.

¶ Apples, peaches, cherries, berries, vegetables and grapes bring remarkable incomes to growers.

¶ Idaho's population increased more than 100% during the last census decade—yet there is plenty of room for more.

QUEEN OF SHEBA'S VISIT TO KING SOLOMON

THE Queen of Sheba's Visit to King Solomon is one of the most famous incidents in the history of the ancient world. The oriental magnificence of King Solomon's Court brought forth the exclamation, "The half has never been told!" The beautiful picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, illustrates but ONE event out of all the THOUSANDS that make up the history of every nation, ancient and modern, all accurately and entertainingly told in the world-famed publication,

Ridpath's History of the World

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, IN REVIEWING THIS GREAT PUBLICATION, SAID IN PART: "Ridpath's History of the World may be regarded as a complete library in itself. No other work of its kind has ever supplied a History so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent hand, guiding and developing all things. We cheerfully commend this most popular and complete of all world histories to our readers."

NEVER AGAIN SUCH A BOOK BARGAIN AS THIS!

President McKinley said: "I am familiar with the merits of Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people generally."

William J. Bryan said: "Dr. Ridpath's History of the World is a lasting monument to the author's intelligence and industry. It is thorough and comprehensive."

President Warren Boston University, said: "I should be glad to see it placed in the library of every young person in the United States, and even in the English-speaking world. In families where there are bright children it will render excellent service to the cause of popular intelligence."

Bishop Vincent said: "Ridpath's History is in clear and agreeable style, comprehensive in treatment, readable type and admirable illustrations. This set of books is a permanent college chair of general history in one's own house."

DR. Ridpath gives the history of every religion of mankind, and shows the slow but sure progress that has been made from Paganism to Christianity, from darkness to light. The customs and habits of people, the development of their science and literature and art, the growth of religion and education form a very vital part of this history, and that which gives the work its lasting popularity is the wonderfully beautiful and fascinating style in which it is written. To read this work is not only to increase one's fund of knowledge, but to improve the literary style in which we write or speak, and to expand and develop the mental powers.

EVERY American citizen should know the history of his own country and of the world to intelligently perform his full duty as a citizen in the government of this Nation. How else are we to judge of the great national questions that crowd upon us for decision except by some knowledge of the past? Read the history of mighty Babylon, or of imperial Rome as a kingdom, then as a republic, and finally as an empire, and familiarize yourself with her growth, development and decay. Then, when you know the cause of the rise and downfall of empires and nations, you will be able to intelligently discuss and decide the great questions that are pressing now everywhere for attention.

Why You Ought to Buy Ridpath's History Now

Because it is the only general history recognized everywhere as authority.

Because it is complete. It begins with the oldest civilization and gives the complete history of every country and every race; in fact, the history of mankind, including all achievements in war, discovery, invention, art, science, religion, philosophy and government.

Because it is the most beautifully illustrated of any historical work ever issued. It contains more than 2,000 illustrations. A famous educator has said that he considers the illustrations alone worth the entire cost of the set.

Because it will not only interest and instruct the average man or woman, but it will delight the children. It is so beautifully written that children will learn to love history reading. It will start them along the line of reading good things, of becoming interested in that which is true instead of reading novels and trashy literature.

Because the new ninth volume tells the story of recent, we might almost say, current events. It gives the complete history of the Boer War, the Spanish-American War, and the more recent Russia-Japan War. It brings the history of every nation right down to date.

Because Ridpath's History of the World is absolutely accurate and thoroughly reliable. Dr. Ridpath spent the span of an ordinary lifetime in writing the work.

Because this is your chance to buy it at a nominal price—much less than the work has ever been offered before or ever will be offered again—and you may pay in small sums monthly if you prefer. MAIL THE COUPON.

In the Potato Field

The Hand Cultivators Among the Beans

Work That Is Made Into Fun

COLLEGE FEES RIGHT FROM THE SOIL

"EY, you fellows! All aboard for the sparkling streamlet!"

A dozen sun-tanned students, who had been working industriously at the celery-beds of the College Farm at Princeton, straightened up, and, with suspicious celerity, fell into line for the to the brook. This brook finds its way through -five acres of fine farm land that the Princeton Uni- y trustees have lent for cultivation to those students ind it necessary to earn their college fees and their while acquiring an education. It was a five-minutes' across plowed fields, and on the way student-farmers l enthusiastically about their summer experiences.

njoying ourselves?" laughed one sunburned boy. , just watch us. We are having a far better time any pampered pet of adoring parents who at this nt is basking in the calcium at a fashionable summer . Me for the 'back to the soil' experience every None of us ever felt better in our young lives, be- me.

; we have no whistle to call us to work, and no set of . We're just a little band of willing workers, and the edge that we are getting a college education by our ons on the farm makes the work as good as fun. Be- just look at the practical knowledge of the agricultural business we are ring. Haven't we got it all over the chaps who sit and throw pebbles at aves all through the summer vacation? Any one of us knows enough to a truck-farm if we had to, and of us were as green as those to- plants about farming when we ame on the college reservation.

ow did we learn? Well, that was of the plan all thought out by our Mater. The student you saw ow—the one who was not working quit your kidding, you fellows; don't work yourselves, you can't that I don't)—I mean the over- tudent—he knows all about farm- You see, he was born and brought a farm, and he runs this thirty- re truckery in the real profes- l way. He had to show us what in the first place. Now, each fel- knows his work thoroughly, and thing moves like five thousand s' worth of motor car on an as- road. There is no real bossing, understand. We know our work ell. And another thing let me tell There are too many chaps all the country looking for this snap ny of us to risk our chance by sol- g on the job. Here's the place we get off to take a drink."

tin cup furnished the fastidious he means of dipping up the water, nost of the students lay at full h on the edge of the brook and in the fashion favored by simple ns of the Stone Age. In the same ing brook, below the drinking-point, other students indulged in a near-bath. Then, much refreshed within and without, the members of the College Farm Squad trooped back to the hoes, the hand-cultivators and the celery-beds.

The Water Wagon

"To continue," said my own particular student. "I was telling you there are many fellows looking for a chance to get on this farm, who can't make it. You see, the number of boys permitted to farm has to be limited by the extent of the land. Otherwise, the plan would not work. You would be surprised to know how many students have begged to be allowed to join the working-squad, who haven't the least need of the money. Chaps with everything they want have asked to come into our little 'honest sons of toil band,' because they see how we enjoy it, and how it keeps us in splendid condition. Football men and members of the athletic teams have had to be chased away. They have clamored to be permitted to become farmers. It appeals to them as serving the same end as training, without the awful drudgery of training on track or field. But we can't have them spoiling our game. We need this little thirty-five-acre truck-patch for our own little college expenses.

"But before long something will probably be done by the trustees for the clamoring throngs. From all over the country, as far as Texas, letters have come by the hundred, begging for a chance to work through Old Nassau by putting in time on the College Farm. It will probably result in a big increase in the acreage, and then the 'working-through' squad can be increased in numbers.

"One result of the innovation has been to remove from Princeton the stigma, if it can be so called, of being a rich man's college. Perhaps that was what influenced the trustees, to some extent, in establishing this means of working through the university course. Anyway, no one can reproach us any more with being a university solely for exclusives, since the college made it possible for any boy of the right sort to get an education here without doing more than work for it. Of course, the farm does not actually pay the entire bill. But the trustees look after the deficit. We get our education, and live at the college, and in return we till the soil of this bully little farm, and furnish the tables of the seat of learning to which we are attached with the best kind of vegetables, right from the soil at the college door.

"When the dinner-hour comes, you will see us meander in the direction of the university. We are the only students there at this vacation time, and we dine all together and live together. It wouldn't be such fun if we didn't share each other's troubles and find comfort in numbers. There are about sixteen of us now.

WORLD SCIENTISTS IN CONCLAV

THAT old adage, "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," seems to have become the slogan, not only of the careful old-fashioned housewives, but, of the medical profession as it is represented by its leading members from all parts of the world. During the last week of September this was proven time after time in the sessions of the International Congress on Hygiene and Demography which, for the first time in the sixty years of its history, met on American soil, at Washington, D. C. For several days before the actual sessions began the hotel corridors of Washington were abuzz with cosmopolitan activity, and as there were over two thousand foreign delegates, some of the hotels heard more different foreign languages and more of them than ever before in their history.

President Taft, who was introduced by Dr. Henry P. Walcott of Boston, the chairman of the conference, opened the sessions with a speech of welcome to the delegates. Mr. Taft made a special trip from Beverly, his summer home, to Washington, to make this address in his capacity as honorary president of the organization. Surrounding him on the platform were many foreign diplomats resident in Washington, and the chairmen of the foreign delegations to the congress. Resplendent in gold lace and varied uniforms, the military and naval delegates, including high officers of the French, Austrian, German, English, Russian, and Italian armies and navies, added color to the setting. It was the greatest international conclave of scientific men America had ever seen. Mr. Taft aroused considerable enthusiasm when in the course of his address he said: "We need to develop under governmental auspices a bureau or a department in which the funds of the government shall be expended for research of every kind useful in the practice and enforcement of hygiene and preventative medicine. That something of this sort may grow out of the present United States Public Health Service there is reason to believe, but it will need far greater appropriations and a widening of its scope of duties before it shall have filled the place that the medical profession of this country has a right to expect the general government to create in the progress of hygiene and demography."

When after the President's address the roll call of the nations took place the heads of thirty-three delegations representing as many different governments responded to the President's greetings. There was an informal reception at the White House, and immediately afterward the congress plunged into its discussions on the problems which arise in the world-wide efforts of the medical profession to conserve human life and health.

There were two main divisions of the congress, nine sections and two subsections. In the sessions of each of these sections and subsections hundreds of papers were read, addresses delivered and discussions carried on relative to the thousands of subjects which this great body of the world's scientists had met to consider. As had been anticipated, there came forth in the course of these proceedings the announcements that important discoveries and advances had been made since the last International session of the conference took place. Drs. John F. Anderson and Joseph Goldberger of the United States Public Health Service made public three discoveries in connection with their studies of measles and typhus fever. Dr. Peyton Rous of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research announced the discovery of a new unnamed organism which has a vital connection with the transmission and growth of tumors. Dr. Frederick G. Novy of the University of Michigan told of his discovery of one of the smallest and deadliest of micro-organisms which he believes will prove of the greatest value in wiping out the bubonic plague, as the newly discovered organism is peculiarly adapted to the production of fatal disease in rats, and, so far as his experiments have led, in rats only. Measuring only one-billionth of a cubic centimeter in size, he said, this micro-organism would kill a rat in a single day.

President Taft Opening the Fifteenth International Conference on Hygiene, Washington, D. C.

During the conference subjects varying through all the phases of hygiene and preventative medicine were thoroughly canvassed. Municipal health problems of all sorts were discussed by men who have been in close contact with the great problems of such centers of population as London, England; New York; Berlin, Germany; and Chicago. Dr. Max Rubner, who was introduced to the congress as the "Dr. Wiley of Germany," delivered a special address on the "Nutriment of the People." "One of the greatest, if not the greatest, of problems now confronting mankind," said Dr. Rubner, "is that of providing the race with proper nourishment. It is of such importance, in fact, that every large city should have a department in its government clothed with plenary powers of caring for this branch of the people's welfare." He also told the convention that malnutrition in children, even from homes where it was absolutely unnecessary, had become so general and reached such a critical stage in parts of the world that, unless the State and municipal authorities made provisions to enforce proper feeding of the younger generation, it was a question if the human race was to be saved from degeneration. The doctor said further:

"Then, too, cooking is a lost art so far as women in this modern age are concerned. This condition should not be so, and is a big factor in the high cost of living.

"Housekeeping is a noble art, an interesting high vocation. Cases of actual starvation are numerous, but cases of undernourishment are common to an extent that is horrifying."

The following days were filled with discussions on the hygiene of almost every conceivable phase of human activity; the hygiene of factories and factory-workers, of mines and miners, of the office, the street above all, else, of the school and public places. Sir Thomas Oliver of the University of Durham College of Medicine, Newcastle, England, delivered an address in the National Museum on the evening of September 23. He spoke on "Dust and Fumes, Foes of Industrial Life," and presented many new and original aspects of the problem. M. Jacques Bertillon, a noted French health statistician, addressed the congress on "Mortality and Causes of Death in the Professions." His statements caused considerable discussion and it is hoped, led to the promotion of new ideas in hygiene for the men and women in professional life.

One interesting feature of the congress was a great exhibit which was prepared in a temporary building erected for the purpose. Here almost every conceivable device of value in the promotion of health and the prevention of disease was exhibited. "Prevention" might well have been inscribed over the entrance of this temporary hall, for from the "kill the fly" sign in the window of a market to the big working model of a city filtration plant all worked toward that one idea. The activities of the public health service and its various bureaus, what States and cities and hundreds of private charities are accomplishing, how the tenement-dwellers of large cities are being taught better housing and living conditions, what large manufacturing concerns and other employers are doing for the well-being of their employees, how the welfare of babies are being looked after, what children's playgrounds are accomplishing, and what schools and colleges are doing in their physical development departments, are all placed vividly before the eye by working models and demonstrations.

That the entire time of the sessions in Washington was not devoted to serious business was evidenced by the fact that the Washington Board of Trade and Chamber of Commerce entered into the activities of the conference with an elaborate program of entertainment. There was a garden party at the White House, a pilgrimage to Mount Vernon, a public reception at the New National Museum and a number of trips down the Potomac River.

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS of New York City opened September 9 with 730,000 pupils as against 703,000 last year. Owing to the lack of school accommodations some 80,000 pupils will attend on part time only.

—THE SALVATION ARMY announces its intention of erecting a Central Training College as a fitting memorial to the late General William Booth, the founder and head of the Army. General Bramwell Booth has approved the project. It is estimated that $250,000 will be required to erect the proposed building.

—HENRY HOUSEN, a reader of this paper in Kansas, writes that the plague among horses in that State has already carried off 6,000 victims in the last few weeks. Kansas has been blessed with good crops this year, but the horse epidemic will probably prove a severe handicap. Injections of serum have been tried but have proved of little value.

—PROBABLY THE SEVEREST TYPHOON recorded swept over Japan on Sunday, September 22. The loss of life was very heavy and tens of thousands were rendered homeless. It is estimated that the damage done from a material standpoint will amount to $20,000,000. At Gifu 262 people were killed and 283 injured. Every house in Nagoya was overthrown, the entire harbor demolished and three steamers sunk. At Osaka, 20,000 houses were ruined, and the piers and breakwaters of the harbor swept away.

—ENGLAND HAS NOT BEEN alone in finding herself compelled to count up into almost appalling figures the damages which have been done by a summer of almost constant rain and attendant floods. The rains in Holland and Sweden have caused great damage to crops, and have swept away and submerged many homesteads. The bridge at Kvibille, carrying traffic between Falkenberg and Halmstad, has been entirely destroyed. Several persons are known to have been killed and many others are reported missing. Church services in a number of the hamlets and smaller towns have been suspended, as it is impossible for the circuit-riding clergymen to reach them.

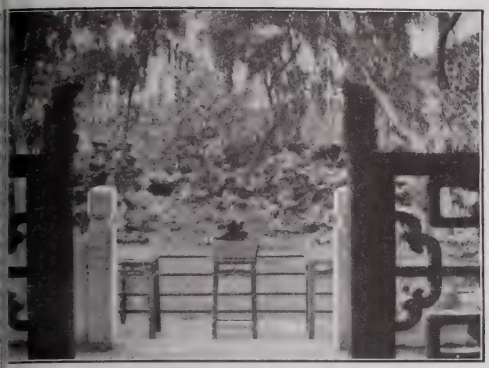
—THAT THE RELIGIOUS question is entering into politics is made evident from many indications. One of the latest is contained in a letter from Paul F. Dehnel, editor of the Republican, Worthington, Minn., who writes: "I am enclosing a copy of my platform. I am a candidate for Congressman-at-large in Minnesota, and, as you will observe, I have adopted one of the planks of the Guardians of Liberty." The plank referred to is that which declares for the preservation of our institutions against any foreign and menacing influence, and that Congress should protest against diversion of public funds or lands to any religious or sectarian purpose. Mr. Dehnel's platform has been strongly approved by a number of editors and pastors, and he is evidently making a good fight and winning many friends.

—IT IS SOMEWHAT REMARKABLE that three great conferences dealing with the leading issues of the day were held recently simultaneously, two in this country and one in Europe. The nineteenth International Peace Congress opened at Geneva September 23, and every country in the world sent delegates except Italy. The chief issues discussed were questions of international law and international relations, taking up specially the duties of pacifists. On the same day the Fifth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce convened at Boston to consider the increasing high cost of living and other cognate problems. There were forty-four foreign representatives and several hundred delegates of national prominence. The chief topics discussed were tariff revision, legislation regulating monopolies and trusts, co-operation, elimination of the middleman, municipal markets, workingmen's compensation and housekeeping clubs. The great unrest of the country caused by the high prices was emphasized and it was pointed out that this unrest and discontent might finally lead to revolution. The third conference constituted the fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography and was held in Washington the first week. An account of this conference appears above.

A CHINESE NOBLEMAN AT HOME

A VISIT TO THE HOME OF A HIGH FUNCTIONARY OF WEALTH IN THE DAYS OF THE PAST IMPERIAL REGIME

BY E. R. JOHNSTONE



One of the Ferneries in the Inner Court

A Chinese Lady at Home

The Lotos-Covered Lake on Lord Ho's Grounds

WOULD you like to meet a Chinese millionaire of high rank in his own ancestral home?" asked my friend as we sat on the porch of his high house in Chinkiang one ay in June, some years ago. This was years be- re the revolution, which has since changed hina's imperial government to that of a republic d sealed the doom of rank and title in that land here many titles dated back nearly a thousand ars.

"I would like it above all things," I replied.

So it came about that, soon after, we were duly vited to call upon Lord Ho at Yangchow, in the rovince of Kiangsu, and to see what few foreigners er witness—a bit of the home-life of a great Chi- se nobleman of the old régime. This unusual nor was due to my friend, who has occupied a gh position in the missionary field in China for e last twenty-seven years, and who not only peaks "Mandarin" but several dialects fluently, d is persona grata with many an over-lord, anchu as well as Chinese proper.

Yangchow is one of the ten great cities of China d is located on the Grand Canal about fourteen iles north of the Yangtsekiang, or sixteen miles om Chinkiang. The city is walled and has a ative population of more than three-quarters of a illion, while of foreign residents there is a scant zen—all missionaries, save two petroleum agents. e reached the city from Chinkiang by steam unch, passing, as always when voyaging on the rand Canal, hundreds of novel sights.

For miles along the canal front the launch made ow way through the narrow lanes left by the housands of junks and sampans, finally mooring pposite one of the largest of the traffic gates which ierce the huge wall at intervals, and which are rowded with men, merchandise and mendicants.

From the gate we made our way in sedan chairs, an advance courier, who shouted our greatness and our destination, being a necessity, so narrow were the thoroughfares and so crowded with men, women, children, donkeys, caribaos, wheelbarrows and goods of every conceivable variety.

Unless you visit Yangchow, Suchow, or some of the large cities without foreign concession-areas, you never see the real China; never can appreciate the density of urban population, the multifarious occupations, the range of manufacture, the startling difference between the caste of the coolie and that of the artisan. My friend had told me of the splendor in which Lord Ho lived, but it was hard to believe the tale when we alighted at his gate. His house was enclosed by a wall that stretched from right to left for hundreds of feet, but the embrasure through which we made our way to the dingy metal gate of entrance was far from inviting, filled as it was with beggars and filth that disgustingly appealed to more than the sense of sight.

What a change when the gates swung open in welcome! We were ushered into a large antechamber where the grandsons of our host awaited us. Without were misery and dirt—within, luxury and high refinement. There was a homelike air that I had not found in any of the other yamens (official homes) into which duty and ceremony had called me.

Before we had advanced more than a dozen steps, tea was served us, and by servants of a caste much above any I had seen before. The major-domo or butler of the primary gate was dressed in beautiful silks, and while he "kotowed" deeply and often, he did so with full retention of personal dignity. The grandsons—young men of from eighteen to twenty-one years—spoke purest English, having had foreign tutors from their infancy, and the elder of the two in welcoming us begged that we would forgive and forget the "filthy appearance of the house," due to the fact that the family had been in occupancy but a few days, having recently come from their Shanghai residence on the Bubbling Well Road.

After a long walk through corridors paved with tiles of many colors and lined with porcelain columns of beauty and rarity, we reached a patio or court with playing fountains and exquisite plants, flowers and dwarfed trees. Here we found tables set with tea equipage of rare china, and with confections and cakes of all the colors of the rainbow and all the tastes of a delicatessen cargo.

From a door near by there came to us an old man —considerably over three-score and ten, but reasonably vigorous—who greeted us with the most dignified hospitality and the most impressive courtesy imaginable. Lord Ho is not only very rich but very learned. He is an authority on Chinese antiques, accumulation of which has been his pastime for years. He held high office in the old Imperial Government at Peking; having been prefect, taotai, governor, foreign minister, and the like, and retired from public life only because of advancing years and the desire to spend the rest of his days in the bosom of his family.

He is of medium height, with piercing black eyes, a chin-beard of the Brother Jonathan variety, a complexion not unlike that of the high-class American Indian; wears his nails exceptionally long, and dresses in a modest-tinted robe of silk, belted at the waist in simplest fashion, and as far removed as possible from the gaudy or the spectacular. On his head was a fez-shaped cap, from the front of which gleamed a fine ruby—his single notable ornament.

Chinese courtesy is apt to wear upon the foreigner, so elaborate is it, so long-drawn. Lord Ho eschewed all that, greeted us as an American ex-official of years, wealth and prominence might have done, and begged us to be seated. (The invitation

THE CHURCH'S OPPORTUNITIES

A SERMON

BY

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.*

TEXT: "The field is the world." Matt. 13: 38

OUR churches in America may for the sake of definition be divided into two classes: inspirational and institutional. Only a few churches can be institutional. Every church should be inspirational. The institutional church requires generally a great outlay of money—more than the average church can command. A church in the nature of the case is not a money-making institution any more than a home. There are three great institutions in society which are continually requiring money, but never earning any. Those are the church, the family and the school. Yet no man begrudges the money he spends on his home. He will pay out hundreds of dollars for the care, growth, feeding, housing, clothing, and educating of a child, and if he never gets a cent of money back counts the money all well spent if the child grows up to be a good man. The same thing is true of our thought of the school. We do not begrudge the expenses of a public school, a college or a university, although we are constantly spending money to send our children to them. Neither should we count the cost of maintaining a church, although we are getting no money dividends from it. The dividends, of course, are in manhood and womanhood, which in the long run are worth more than all the money in creation. But while this is true, the average community composed of average wage-earners cannot afford to maintain what is known as an institutional church. It requires more money than can be continually raised. That does not mean, however, that the average church cannot be a power of life against death. Any real inspirational church has a tremendous reason for existence and can carry on the work which Jesus commanded and prophesied. Let us see what the average church of to-day has within its own organization to use for power. These forces do not have to be created; they are already in existence, which is a tremendous thing to begin with. Have you ever stopped to think how long it takes to organize anything which really lives? Nearly every day some new society or organization springs into existence and nearly every day some one that was born a few months ago dies. The church, however, is organized right to our hand and has the great advantage of having behind it the centuries.

Engines of Power

Right at the hand of the church as an engine of power is the Sunday school. It is not only a great religious but a great educational institution. The report of the Commissioner of Education in the United States sometimes puts as much as thirty pages into the report of the Sunday schools of America by way of additional forces in civilization. Any one who sneers at a Sunday school sneers at a thing infinitely bigger than himself. We criticize our own Sunday schools. We sometimes fall into the error of thinking they are insignificant. Our teachers in the nature of the case cannot be paid. They are sometimes seemingly poor material. We have half an hour once a week to teach the most tremendous truths and the thing looks very poor and pitiful at long range. But year in and year out the Sunday school of the church does a work which no other organization on earth can do or does do. Let us take off our hats to the Sunday school. Civilization offers nothing like it. The church has this power to-day.

Along with the Sunday school power is the work with the young. The young people's societies may in some places be losing their hold, but young men and young women are the same to-day as they have always been. When they are religious they are profoundly so. The church has a hold on young life. Any church which has any reason for existence against which the gates of death cannot prevail is a church which can always reach young men and women. That in itself is a great power.

The church has, as a historical heritage, social powers. It touches men and women on the side of their neighborly instincts. It gets them together regardless of politics or anything else in gatherings where they become better acquainted. It is a good mixer, the church is, for the community, and this in itself is no small means for the leavening of that sometimes hard lump known as society.

Another great power of the church is its missionary enterprise. The world at large does not understand the immense amount of service which the church has rendered the great world. It is not very well advertised. The daily papers very seldom give us any missionary news. Our little church publications are so small, so modest, and we are so retiring ourselves in the matter of subscribing to them, that we ourselves, members of the church, do not know the extent of missionary enterprise. But if China is a republic to-day, if Japan is reaching up like a young giant to make herself new and wonderful strength, if Turkey is coming out of the dark ages of its cruelty and oppression, if that old tyranny in Persia is beginning to think, it is because the churches in America have for the last century been sending the light of liberty into those countries. There is no other answer for those upheavals except the answer which comes out of the missionary money and the missionary enthusiasm of the last century, all of which has been a product of the modern church.

Definite Purpose and Great Results

The church finds already established to its uses what is known as the midweek service. It is not irreverent to say that what has been known throughout the church as the prayer-meeting has for one reason or another greatly changed within the last quarter of a century. Hundreds of churches find a growing difficulty in maintaining this service along the lines which were followed some fifty years ago; but aside from that fact the church has an established custom of meeting together for conference and religious work on some special day in the week. That has established a habit among at least a certain number of church people which can be utilized, as will be indicated later on.

The church has also what no other organization in the world has: a regular, systematic, continuous appeal from the pulpit and from its entire organization—a regular appeal to the divine, the spiritual, and the ideal. Political organizations do not try to influence men generally along lines of divine exaltation. Commercial organizations are not in the business of changing men's purposes. Educational institutions are not as a rule concerned as they should be with the spiritual welfare of the students. The endless number of organizations known to mankind, literary, medical, legal, political, educational, geographical, commercial, are not making a regular, constant appeal to mankind to be better morally and spiritually. The church is making that appeal. It is in the business of trying to change men's habits and on that account is an engine of force which is engaged in the greatest business known to mankind.

The question may now honestly and fairly be asked: How may the church get the greatest results, considering its regular organization, the number of forces at its command and its place in the world?

First, the relation which exists between the people of the church and its pastor is a peculiar one. It is not duplicated by the relation of the doctor to his patients, the lawyer to his clients, the business man to his customers, or the newspaper man to his subscribers. There is a different relationship between people and pastor from that existing in any other walk in life. The church will gain the greatest result if there exists between people and pastor the greatest possible confidence and the willingness to grant on both sides the largest possible freedom. The church may expect great results when every member of it, because he is a member of the church, is also a missionary; that is, not simply a person who comes to church to hear preaching and supports the church, as he says, by paying toward the expenses. The church will gain the greatest results when every member of it is an evangelist and a missionary and a seeker after souls as much as is the pastor. In other words, a church membership should not be a collection of people over whom the minister must constantly labor in order to keep them good-natured or to keep them Christian, but it should be an organization made up of Christian people who are trying to bring people into the kingdom as much as the minister himself. This result is possible only when the members and the pastor together are working for the one great common end and are emphasizing the great thing for which a church exists. No great work will ever be accomplished by the church until it defines its own purpose and mission in the world, which is to make disciples of all the nations.

The greatest possible result will flow from the church when it emphasizes work for the young. The regular, steady, permanent growth of the church must depend not upon unusual revival efforts, but upon regular, usual, systematic training of the young already in the Sunday school and the young people's organizations. This is the only permanent and satisfactory path of growth which the church will ever possess. Without criticizing what are ordinarily called "revival efforts" any member of this church can recall occasions when evangelists have spent a month and the churches have been called upon to pour out large quantities of time, energy and money with the result that perhaps a half dozen people are brought into the church by the combined effort. The same amount of time, energy, and money spent by the church in training its young—in saving life before it had gone wrong, in preventing sin instead of bringing in a remedy after it had been committed—would have resulted in a great many more real accessions to the church. I believe the future growth of every healthy church will depend largely upon the reasonable, regular, undramatic and quiet teaching of young life.

The church will realize its greatest result when it begins to use the midweek service for the largest possible work. If what is known as the old-time prayer meeting of testimony has passed away, the church need not be discouraged nor fearful of losing power. It can make great use of the midweek service for educational purposes. The average man or woman in the average church is vastly ignorant concerning the missionary work of the world, for example. Any church could well afford to spend fifty-two nights in the year studying world-wide missions, bringing the facts before the people. What church members need generally is information. They do not know what is being done in the kingdom. They know hardly anything about the great triumphs of the cross. What better use can be made of the midweek service than to use it as a great school of information? There has been a great amount of waste time spent by a small handful of people in churches who have honestly thought they must preserve the traditions of the church and maintain a small circle, fearful of losing out of the church what they have called its spiritual center. The use of the midweek service for an educational campaign need not lose out of the meeting its spiritual fervor or its devotional character. In fact, the increased knowledge of God's kingdom and of Christ's power gained through increased information will add to the spiritual uplift of the entire church.

The Mission of the Church

The greatest result will come to the church when missionary zeal is highest and most intelligent. The great business of the church is saving the world. This includes the family living next door to the church and everybody else, no matter where he may be, if he is not a disciple. There is no such thing as "home" and "foreign" missions. My uncle was pastor of a little home missionary church in southern Dakota. One of his members had gone to Turkey and was working there under the American Board in a small native church. At one of the first meetings held by my uncle in his new struggling little church he urged the people to take up an offering for foreign missions and send it to Turkey where this member of his was. At almost identically the same time, the member over in Turkey, in order to develop the missionary spirit among his people, invited them to take up a missionary offering and send it over to Dakota to my uncle's church which was a struggling home missionary enterprise. The two offerings were received at about the same time. The church in Dakota sent a "foreign" missionary offering to Turkey and the church in Turkey sent a "foreign" missionary offering to

THE ROYAL GIFT

TO KNOW, and do, the will of God,
This is the joy supreme:
To walk with him each gladsome hour,
This is no idle dream.
But a sublime reality,
Which every soul may prove
The soul-reviving joy and bliss
Of God's eternal love.

Only believe, and serve him here,
And to us shall be given
Pardon and sweet assurance now,
And rest with him in heaven.
So we'll dismiss all craven fear,
Trusting alone in him;
Till we in heaven shall see his face
And join the cherubim.

The Church's Opportunities

Dakota. The field is the world. There is no limit to it.

The church will realize its greatest results when it has the right definition of neighborhood service. Here is where the church which is unable to do institutional can really be of immense service. It can make a social survey of its surroundings. This can be done through committees of its members. It is being done by several churches at the present time. The church can take account of its own members—how many of the members are in the professional class, how many in the artisan class, how many are working on salaries, how many are on day's wages. It can make itself useful by establishing a fund in the treasury from which persons in need can borrow. This would cover cases of sickness, doctor's and undertaker's expenses and funeral expenses generally. Many churches are adopting this method and find it exceedingly helpful. In other words, the socializing of the church's immediate neighborhood, including its own members, will bring great results along certain lines.

Great results may be obtained by the church so far as it encourages the thought of federation. The denominations historically have done a great work for the kingdom. They have existed with reason, and there should be no great criticism of them; but I believe they have served their purpose and that the next century will witness the union of church bodies in a real brotherhood. There is not enough difference between the great denominations of Christendom to hold them apart any longer. Methodists and Baptists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists practically believe the same great truths of the Christian faith. Why should there be ten distinct organizations in one neighborhood? If ministers could do their work in unity, they could accomplish vastly more for the kingdom, and the church of Jesus Christ must keep as a vision which will some time be realized the federation of Christendom.

After all else has been said the church must remember that it is in the greatest business known to mankind. There is no greater business than religion and the whole world will never be any better until man's religious life is what it ought to be. All the schemes of the politicians of any party or plans to legislate the world into righteousness, doing away with inequality and injustice, will be of no account unless men's hearts are right with God and with one another. It is the supreme business of the church in the world to teach men to love God and one another, and until men love God and one another they will continue to be selfish and cruel, they will continue to fight together politically and industrially. The only way in which we can create a sentiment for more righteous dealing between man and man is to change the heart and purpose of the man who is going to create the sentiment. This is the business of the church and there is no greater business known to the earth.

A LITTLE JOURNEY TO THE HILLS

WE HAVE found rest and gladness in our rambles through the green fields; we have found friendly comradeship in the little rivers, and in "the brotherhood of venerable trees"; but when we have sought inspiration and strength in nature we have taken a journey to the mighty hills. Some dwellers in the valley who are short of vision and lacking in inspiration think of the mountain-tops only as cold, severe and unattainable, but to others they stand as a peculiar and exalted source of blessing. "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help," sang David. It is a song, or an eager prayer, that rises from the heart of the man and the woman who needs that special help which is fittingly symbolized in the everlasting hills.

When the spirit seeks uplift, it is good to get the eyes and the mind away from the traffic, the strife, and the little, shifting, transient things of the plain, and to look up where the everlasting hills

Changeless watch the changeless heaven.

Calmly and boldly they seem to pierce the very throne-room and join earth with heaven. As we look, and look, our spirit mounts up with wings as the eagle. There can be no uncertainty—and we know, with George Macdonald, that there is

A meaning on the face of the high hills;
A something is behind them: that is God.

The mountain-top seems to melt away into the blue haze of the summer sky, until it is hard to tell where earth ends and heaven begins. Both are blended into one. There are moments of exaltation when our spirits seem almost to be lifted into the place of glory and transfiguration. Such moments come sometimes with great blessing as we take our journey to the mighty hills.

WHEN the fight is hard; when achievement grows more difficult; when the desired goal seems to recede as we struggle on toward it, there is inspiration in steep and rugged hills. They represent toilsome, persistent climbing if the summit is to be reached. The camel kneels to let his rider step into his place, but no mountain-top ever bends its rocky head to meet the climber. There it stands, unyielding, a challenge to utmost endeavor, to valiant mastery of difficulties, to proud achievement in the end.

Year after year ambitious explorers battled with the steep snows of Mount McKinley in the effort to reach the summit. Fearless, adventurous souls find a fascination in the dangers and almost unconquerable difficulties of the great mountains. Send out the word that any particular mountain-peak has never yet been scaled, that it has baffled every climber, that brave men have tried and failed, and that death stands guarding its perilous heights—at once other bold men spring up in every land and rush to the conquest, saying, "No mountain-peak shall defy me. I will stand on that summit."

So in every field of human endeavor the difficult achievement challenges the man who feels his power. Man was not made to grovel nor to be a defeated creature all his days. He was placed on earth with the distinct command to subdue it. No difficulties must prevent his doing the thing that is good and ought to be done. As he views the difficult ascent to victory his spirit rises. The very height and peril of the mountain-top calls to him and he climbs, toiling and panting, to the summit.

BROAD view and splendid outlook is one of the rewards of the man who wins the summit of his mountain. Just naturally he breaks into a song of joy and triumph. I remember the day I climbed Mount Marcy, the highest mountain in New York State. Late in the afternoon we reached what we supposed was the very top. The view was glorious, and we stood there singing,

Oh Beulah land, sweet Beulah land!
As on thy highest mount I stand, etc.

And then we turned around and saw towering far above us another peak which we knew must be Marcy. We had made a mistake and were rejoicing over our victory before it was won. We must go down into the valley and begin our climb all over again. How often the same thing happens in the battle of life.

We cannot stand boastfully on every mountain-top and sing, "Beulah Land." Some are won only at bitter cost and are held only by grim effort. There is no place of rest, but only storm and danger. Such summits must be won, but only because they stand between the pilgrim and his goal. They are not the goal. They are to be passed, and the joy comes when they are behind.

When we came down into the lower passes before beginning the climb of the real Mount Marcy, it was late and a storm was coming on, so we were compelled to camp until morning. The storm grew fiercer each hour. We could not stay long where we were. As soon as it was light enough to see our way, in the small hours of the morning, we began the climb. We had no other choice. We tied ourselves together with a long rope—three men and a dog. The gale tugged hard to carry us away into the mad, racing clouds. The rain cut like a hail of steel. We crawled through the moss and then over the bare rocks, clinging to every crevice and jagged spur. Like worms we dragged our bodies over the storm-swept summit, fighting for our lives in the storm. No exulting over victory then. No rejoicing at the glorious view. No singing of "Beulah Land." At last, with trembling bodies and thankful hearts, we found the trail, down on the other side, and, well-content to leave the mountain-top behind us, we journeyed on, torn and wearied, but safe. Strength of soul came from that struggle and that deliverance. The thing was done, even though hardly done.

Not every journey to the hills is a pleasure excursion, but it is almost sure to be one of profit. Even the hills which confront us in our daily work or our spiritual progress are not there to afford us playgrounds, nor are they there to stop our advance. They give exercise to our strength, our zeal, our skill, our persistence, and our faith. When life goes on too long at a dead level our souls are in danger of growing sluggish. Welcome to the hills that compel us to rise into higher, purer altitudes.

THE BROADER VIEW

WHEN fourscore years have passed away,
We're standing on the sunset slope:
Far, far removed from that glad day
When eagerly we joined in play,
With ball, or bat, or skipping rope,
And out on all things looked with hope.

Far, far removed from childish joys
That lured us on—with glad surprise,
In company with girls and boys
Who shared with us the games and toys,
Which meant so much in youthful eyes,
Beneath those far-off morning skies.

Far, far removed from helpful schools
Where we were taught with skill and care
The all important simple rules,
Which were to be our master-tools—
With which to delve, and do and dare,
As we in noble work should share.

The day is done. The toil is o'er—
The care, and all that brought us pain,
So like the mariner! the shore,
When ends the voyage—is just before.
What seemed a loss was often gain,
Life's lessons have not all been vain.

Now, far removed from all the past,
We're looking toward the setting sun.
Our view extends! How broad, how vast!
We see beyond the shadows cast,
A vision bright! Earth's day is done,
Our future life is just begun.

New Hebrides Missions

A LETTER from J. W. Leggatt, Foreign Missions Department of the Presbyterian Church in Australia, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, gives some interesting information concerning the progress of mission work in the New Hebrides. He writes: "At Aniwa, Dr. Paton's old station, the people, under the care of their native pastors, keep true to their faith, notwithstanding the fact that it is only once or twice a year that a white missionary is able to visit them. On Tanna there has been a remarkable revival going on at Lenakel. Iavis, the old war-chief, with Lomai and a number of the young men, began a week's services in one of the villages, and other villages began to ask similar visits. Some of the young men composed hymns and set them to tunes. Others began to speak with grace and power, and all alike rejoiced because of the joy which had come into their hearts. A new church, which was erected in place of one destroyed by the cyclone of last year, was opened with great rejoicing. It was decorated with palms and crotons, and outside from eight hundred to one thousand people formed into a procession.

"The first service was a harvest thanksgiving. Then eleven couples were married, and the whole congregation filed past and shook hands. On Sunday fifty-five were baptized on profession of faith, and 460 sat down to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. From other stations the brightest reports have come; and these are all the more wonderful considering the havoc done by drink, which French traders continue to sell to the poor natives."

IN AFRICA'S BLACK REPUBLIC

King Baasiai-Nyema, His Chiefs, and the Missionary

West African Devil Doctor

A Chief, His Guard and the Missionary at a Palaver

SEVERAL splendid letters have come to us this week from the various mission fields of Africa, and of all these the most interesting are from Liberia. Writing from the Darobo bush country, inland from Cape Palmas, John and Jessie Pirkins describe a recent visit to a cannibal tribe. "On September 2," Mr. Pirkins says, "I started for Darobo, the nearby cannibal tribe, with Jasper, our native preacher, and six boys for the hammock and luggage. All along the road my boys kept pointing out to me the various trees. One they announced to be gopherwood, and added, 'The kind of wood Noah made the ark of.' A bit farther on we passed a rubber tree, in which we made a small cut with a cutlass so we could see the rubber commence to flow. Walnut, mahoganies and many other valuable hard woods were about us all through our forest trip. As we crossed a stream close to the edge of the forest we noticed fresh tracks of a large drove of wild hogs that had evidently just passed.

"Here the boys asked me to get into the hammock, but I always prefer to walk through the tropic forests, the study of them is so intensely interesting. About 10 A.M. we reached the first cannibal town, and went directly to the king's house. The king was away from home, but one of his many wives (the head one) cooked us some rice, and after putting it in two wooden dishes, set it down on the floor and called us to come and eat. While I was eating the women were laughing and talking, evidently having much amusement at my expense. Jasper told me later that they said, 'This man knows how to eat; he keeps his mouth shut and chews his rice plenty, and does not show his teeth like a countryman.'

"One woman sat down close to me and began stroking my hand, saying, 'This hand is nice and white and soft.' It may be she was thinking my whole body would be rather nice to cook in their palm-butter, as it is not very long since they ate a man in one of their towns. While the rice was cooking we called the people together and had a Gospel service.

"Having again gotten under way at 12 o'clock we reached a lone mission, started by Friday, a Christian native of their own tribe, a convert of the Garraway mission, who has gone back to his own people to share with them the light and blessing he himself is enjoying. Friday also was away from home, but his good wife Esther received us very hospitably. Friday had begged me many times to come over and dedicate his new mission house, so his wife said I must do it this time, while there. Early Sunday morning we had service in the heathen town near by and in the afternoon dedicated the mission house. The king, his chief men and quite a number of others came and gave good attention throughout the service. Afterward the king said, 'We want to know when a white missionary will come. Three of you white missionaries have been here now, and you all talk about a missionary coming to live in our country, but we have waited long, and do not see or hear of any coming yet. It looks like you are telling us a lie. We want you to write a book to your country and tell some white man to make strong and come quick.'"

FROM the Grand Cess district, Rev. Walter B. Williams writes some interesting explanatory notes on the photographs which he forwarded. He says, "Believing that some pictures might tell the story of our people and conditions in this great field, I am sending several which were made recently on the Grand Cess field, inland from Cape Palmas. Though all the discouragements that must attend work in such a field have been ours, we have not been without our successes and encouragements.

"This people is given up to the most debased sort of idolatry. They worship bits of broken crockery or bottles, rocks, trees, rivers, sheep and deer horns, dried monkey skins, and in fact almost anything that strikes their fancy or that of their local devil doctor. Yet the king, Baasiai-Nyema, who in one of the photographs is the second seated at the right, and who is no better than the rest, said to me one day: 'Mr. Williams, I want to live to see you build a big church here, and then I am ready to die. I'm going to tell my god, that sheep-horn, to build this church for your God.'

"This King Baasiai-Nyema is the ruler of the Grand Cess tribe, which is very large and which wields the most powerful influence of any on the Kroo coast.

"The late king's reprobate brother, who was known as Tom Nimily, was once heard to say that he never wanted to live in Grand Cess if a Christian church was built there. He has his wish, for some four years ago the tribe arose and drove the king and all his family into exile; but the church has been built, and now has a membership of over a thousand. All these people are much of the type shown in the accompanying photograph, which was taken at the substation at Pequanini Cess. The most barbarous tortures have been inflicted upon some of these native Christians. They have been tied up by the thumbs or wrists in a doorway, while a fire of red pepper burned beneath them. They have had red pepper rubbed into their eyes and into all the tender parts of the body, all because they have refused to work on Sunday, or eat food sacrificed to idols, or join in the drinking bouts which are one of the chief delights of their countrym Laws are often made with the seeming intent catch the Christians, and for their obedience the true law instead of to those of their chiefs th have been whipped and imprisoned and have l their houses broken down. In spite of all this th have held loyally on and have grown in numb continually.

"The substation at Pequanini was started abou year ago, and though the church there now l nearly one hundred members and a congregation almost five times that number, it is still withou church building. This is a keen trial in the rai season, as we are driven from place to place, b our hopes are high that the near future will see t comparatively small sum needed in hand for t building.

"Work among these Kroo people is not wi out its highly dramatic incidents. Once, wh preaching from the text, 'Will a man rob God? man suddenly sprang to his feet shouting, 'I w not rob God any longer. Take all the idols fr my house.' This we did, and burned and destroy them publicly, while a great crowd looked on silent awe. When o work started here found a naked a almost utterly graded people, b God is doing wonde ful things for t Kroo race, and the e dences are about us many forms.

"One of the mo formidable influenc we have had to co bat is that of t Voodoo men or de doctors. These m extol as virtues all t most vile practice Lying and stealin are a part of the creed, and many the baser crimes a quite permissible long as the perpetr tor escapes detectio They are continual fomenting petty wa between the trib and subtribes, and them murder is but a small matter. They do n hesitate to kill an innocent child that they ma from parts of its body make an idol.

"It has been a great source of delight th through missionary efforts fourteen wars have be averted within the last few years. Roads whic were formerly shut most of the time by tribal wa are now kept open to traffic and commerce. Mar of the chiefs have agreed that I should act as arbit of all disputes, and I am often called upon to atter a palaver and keep peace.

CHATS ON HOUSEHOLD PROBLEMS

A Mother's Question

PERHAPS no question will appeal with more force to many mothers than this: "What is the best course for a mother to take in regard to her son whom she suspects of not living a ral life? Is it best to ignore the subject and do in her power to show that she has faith in him l loves him, or to have an open outbreak? Re-mber, it is only a suspicion, and she fears to lose hold on her boy, as she now has his confidence." This mother's position is as delicate and difficult her responsibility is heavy. No two boys and two situations can be treated alike. It is hard give an answer that would surely fit this case. t one part of her question may be answered by other. Let her ask herself: "Would an 'open break' do any good?" It might destroy her in-ence, weaken her power over him—the only hu-n power, it may be, that can free him from that l power which she fears has laid its grip upon soul and body. She "now has his confidence." at gives her an advantage over his enemy which must not lose. Would she forfeit this by seek-a heart-to-heart talk with him, drawing him , saying on her side as little as she can, but that le calm, and sweet, and wise, and treating his iquity, if there be such, as an affliction from ich he needs deliverance? s he and she a male end in whom she can con-e? If the boy has a good her, the father is the one undertake the office of ofessor and counselor in s instance. If he has no her, then some good, wise n, who stands near to n, might act for the ther. The pastor or the mily physician may be ggested.

This mother's view of the uation and of her respon-ility; her readiness to do ything—even to having "open outbreak" with r boy, "losing her hold on n," sacrificing his affec-n for her in order to save n—is to be commended, d betrays a purpose so re, firm, and wise in its votion as almost to proph-y and to pledge success. at he gives her his "confi-nce" shows on his side an preciation of her and a ality of character that o augurs well.

Tyranny of Dress

NEVER in history were the modes so abhor-ntly indecent as they are day. The pity is that st of the wearers are in-cent young girls who have t the faintest idea of what they are doing. odesty, beauty, and common sense join in the de-and for reform, which need not, as reformed shions are wont to do, jump to the other extreme. this case, a few inches of material will make all e difference between grace and disgrace," says v. P. N. Dreslin of Brooklyn, N. Y. Rev. F. A. ge of Atlanta, Ga., saying practically the same, ds that modest fashions are no indication of und morality, citing the extremely modest attire women in Rome at the time of her worst degenera-n, and the ultra-modest attire, past and present, Oriental women. "Christianity, by giving woman r liberty, has also given her the means of abusing

But we need not be alarmed. It is the nature a fashion to die. It will die just as quickly thout a doctor. The present one is doomed to itk death because it is cruel in its exposure of perfections." Thus the pulpits everywhere are nouncing the "mode," that impalpable tyrant om whom, there is little doubt, a very large section the women of this country literally groan to be ee.

"Please say something on the tyranny of fash-n," pleads one of our readers. "Say it from my ewpoint. I am not rebelling against ugliness or decency so much as abject slavery. The constant anges in dress keep us women on the rack for oney, for time, for everything. If we drop be-nd and look 'dowdy,' we are a reproach to our en-folks, abhorred of our husbands, a shame to r acquaintance. If we keep up with the changes, e have to spend money more freely than most of ought, or we have to scheme and plan, and that takes time and strength from more important things—the raising of our children, the care of our homes, the keeping of our spirits sweet. Even rich women are resenting this incessant, inexorable demand upon time, intellect, and vitality. How many, many precious hours does a change in the size of a sleeve cost! How much precious thought do such trifles demand! Say something, do something, for mercy's sake, to stop the march of this Juggernaut over our bodies! The present styles are economical, pretty, if reformed just a bit—widened, one might say. Let us do that and keep them—until we all get rested and can think out what to do for our freedom and beauty of body—and of soul."

Young Girls and "Emotionalism"

THE experience of many educators in this country is strangely at variance with the conclusion of the London School Board that co-education is a disadvantage to boys, that girls are slower to learn, and that therefore the presence of girls in the same room with boys retards the progress of the latter. This department cannot now take up the large question of co-education, but quotes, in passing, the opinion of a woman teacher on one point involved, because this opinion is of value in another direction:

"The result of my observation, after more than thirty years spent in teaching mixed schools, is that girls are brighter than boys, and learn faster. My 'star' scholars were mostly girls. The boys plodded heavily, the girls flew lightly ahead. One reason, as all know, is that girls of the same age are more mature than boys. But there was more to it than this—something deeper, something in sex character. In after life, my bright, and even my mediocre, boys accomplished more than my bright girls. I heard of them, of the solid things they were doing. My bright girls—girls that were meteor-like—dropped out of sight. I found, on following them up, that they had worn themselves out in emotionalism. They flew at or through everything with the same velocity, the same intensity, with which they had shot through books. The life of woman encourages and overdevelops affectionateness, devotedness. She needs to take herself less seriously or less intensely; to accept her vocation with more calmness and strength, more coolness and poise."

A Young Man's Dilemma

A READER from Carlsbad, N. M.—a young man —writes:

"In No. 31 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in a story entitled 'Back with Her Own Folks,' are questions which I wish you would answer in your Home Department. I know it will interest many young men like me. The story said that when Dorothy went back to her father's home, her brother Ralph told her about his sweetheart Nell, and said: 'She does not know yet what she is to me, but lately I have hardly dared to go near her for fear I could not keep from telling her until I am sure I am ready. What I want to know is whether a fellow just starting out like I am has any right to ask a girl like her to share his life. You know she teaches and makes almost as much by the year as I do. Is it fair to ask her to give up everything and come to help make a home on little more than half of what we both have now, and if she would do it, would she be sorry some time, when she has to skimp and do without things she might have had? Would life lose its sweetness in the hard pull that we might have?'

"I am sure many CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are in about the same position as Ralph was, and will be pleased to have an impartial answer to these questions. I know I will myself."

This young man's dilemma is one that must interest many young lady readers and on which, no doubt, some of the young matrons might give advice from their own experience.

What Shall She Do?

IS IT ever right for a young girl to marry a man of fifty just for a home?" one of our young readers writes us in such evident distress, such painful perplexity of conscience that her letter makes strong appeal to human sympathy. She continues: "He makes no pretense of loving me, but wants a housekeeper. I certainly do not care for him, but I need a home for myself and father. If he were a young man, I could not love him."

Had her question ended with the first sentence, it might be answered thus: It depends upon the character of each. Some girls are staid and set in their ways before they are out of their teens; are home-loving and would cling to the hearthstone and its duties and love any man who was kind to them. Some men—men who have been clean and straight in their lives—are younger at fifty than are some others of fewer years, and are more capable of taking care of a wife and making her happy. Many very conscientious thinkers would say that the concluding clause of this sentence, "just for a home," condemns our young reader's question to the answer, "No. Love only—recognized and positive—should govern such a choice." Her concluding paragraph adds new aspects to her problem. Perhaps other young women are asking themselves like questions. Will our Family Circle — particularly mothers and daughters in it—take this maiden's problem to heart, consider it carefully, and give their views as to what would be her right decision? Send replies to the editor of this page. Please write briefly, not over a hundred words, and on one side of the paper only.

A FRUGAL MEAL

(From a painting by Josef Israels)

IN THE simple home of the peasant the children are the chief treasures. They are rosy and healthy and they make their father and mother equal in dignity with the king on the throne and the queen beside him. Work is easy and life cheery when love and faith abide in true hearts. The frugal meal is shared by all, andthey bring to it the zest of wholesome appetite.

Her Mother's Wedding Gown

A RECENT incident revives what many people recall as an old-fashioned custom. When Miss Mary Cotton Burne walked up the aisle of St. John's Church, Huntington, L. I., to become the wife of Mr. Arnold Furman Sammis, she wore her mother's wedding gown "of ivory white satin and point lace," "and it was very becoming," as the society editors would carefully relate. Whatever was the beauty of the gown and the beauty of the wearer (in this instance considerable, beholders relate), it is the beauty of the sentiment that catches us in this conjunction, and the revival of the old custom, or what was so often done as to be remembered by some as a custom in grandmother's or great-grandmother's day. To fold away the bridal dress, to lay with it the fleecy veil, the orange wreath, the white slippers, for the daughter who might come, was the tender office of many a bride of "old times." Every one did not do it, of course, but fortunate in the eyes of her acquaintance was the girl who received such a legacy from her mother's hand.

The Forward March of Missions

AT NO previous time in the world's history since Christ lived among men, has so much consecrated ability been devoted to the cause of missions as now. It has become customary to criticize foreign missions hastily, and even to belittle their work; but such criticisms in almost every instance spring from sources that were uninformed or hostile. We need not expect praise and encouragement from those who are out of tune with all that we ourselves hold most precious. To the true Christian there is no part of God's work more imperative than the carrying out of the Great Commission which the Master imposed upon his followers, and that it is being carried out right nobly and successfully, the record itself satisfactorily proves.

At the close of the year 1911, the total missionary funds raised by the various Protestant missionary organizations here and abroad for work in heathen lands was $25,297,074. With this magnificent annual offering, support was furnished for 22,058 white missionaries and 88,542 native helpers, teachers, pastors, Bible women, and evangelists at 49,579 different missionary stations in India, Africa, Japan, China, Burma, Siam, the Arctic, South America and Polynesia. The missions had an enrolled list of 4,875,454 adherents, professing Christian belief, of whom 2,304,318 were communicants. In the same year, there were 1,477,049 children in the various missionary schools. The United States contributed nearly one-half of the total fund for conducting the whole work, having raised last year $12,290,005 for missions.

In his excellent book on the Outlines of Missionary History, Alfred DeWitt Mason, D.D., reviews the foundations and rise of Christian missions and shows how marvelously the work has grown, notwithstanding tremendous difficulties. What a difference is presented in heathen lands to-day, contrasted with the time of William Carey, who began work in India in 1793. The last hundred years has been above all others the missionary century. Thousands now labor where Carey stood alone, and tens of thousands of thoroughly equipped men and women are distributed where, some twenty-five years ago, there were only a handful of lone missionaries fighting with heathenism and darkness. Well might the poet feel inspired to say:

God is working his purpose out, as year succeeds to year;
God is working his purpose out, and the time is growing near—Nearer and nearer draws the time, the time that shall surely be,
When the earth shall be filled with the glory of God as the waters cover the sea.

"Circular No. 601. Religious Insignia"*

UNDER the above caption there was issued, on January 27, from the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, an order to superintendents in charge of Indian schools. This order provided that "in government schools all insignia of any denomination must be removed from all public rooms, and members of any denomination wearing distinctive garb should leave such garb off while engaged at lay duties as government employees. If any case exists where such an employee cannot conscientiously do this, he will be given a reasonable time, not to extend, however, beyond the opening of the school year after the date of this order, to make arrangements for employment elsewhere than in the Federal Indian Schools.

On February 3 the Washington Herald reported as follows: "Rev. Mr. Ketcham called at the White House yesterday and was in conference with President Taft. It was after this visit that he intimated that the Valentine order" (the one quoted above) "was to be rescinded." The Reverend Ketcham is at the head of the Catholic Bureau of Indian Missions. He had been correctly quoted by the Washington newspaper man; for in a letter to the Secretary of the Interior President Taft suspended the order of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Robert G. Valentine. The President's grounds were thus indicated: "The commissioner's order has been made without consultation either with you or with me." "The questions presented by this order are of great importance and delicacy. They arise out of the fact that the government has for a considerable period taken for the use of the Indian certain schools theretofore belonging to and conducted by distinctive religious societies or churches. As a part of the arrangements then made the school employees, who were, in certain cases, members of religious orders, wearing the distinctive garb of these orders, were continued as teachers by the government, and by ruling of the Civil Service Commission or by executive action they have been included in the classified service under the protection of the civil service law."

The order of Mr. Valentine, who has recently resigned his position at Washington "voluntarily," became famous in a short time. Thousands of our citizens, when they heard that the President had suspended the order of the Indian Commissioner and was contemplating its entire withdrawal, wired and in other ways expressed their approval of Mr. Valentine's action and their eager desire that the President should uphold the Commissioner in his patriotic and progressive measure. Protestants in particular were quick to discern that Mr. Valentine's order was simply a practical application of the accepted American principle of the separation of church and state, and that its provisions were fair and considerate to all parties concerned. The President was told that the attitude which he had assumed over and against Mr. Valentine was "un-American."

Press reports from Washington under date of September 22 state that after months of deliberation, and after many conferences with interested parties were held by the Secretary of the Interior, the President has finally decided to make his suspension of Mr. Valentine's order permanent, with the understanding, however, that while teachers now employed in Indian schools may continue to wear the garb of their religious orders, this privilege is denied to any persons hereafter entering the service.

This decision of the President may be politic, but it is regrettable. By the Act of June 10, 1896, it had been "declared to be the settled policy of the government to hereafter make no appropriation whatever for education in any sectarian school." And "the final appropriation for sectarian schools" was accordingly made and approved by the Act of March 1, 1899. Thus the President had the mature judgment of the nation, rendered through its representatives, before him to guide him in his action and to justify him in advance if he chose to uphold Mr. Valentine's order, yea, to compel him to uphold it. We can imagine that strong pressure was brought to bear upon him from the opposite direction, and that at this particular season it was extremely difficult for the President not to yield to that pressure. His present decision virtually treats the principle of the division of church and state, not as a principle, which it is, but as a policy, which none of its advocates desire it to be. If the wearing of religious garb by employees of the government is permissible in fifty-one cases out of 2,000, we should like to know what these fifty-one employees have done to merit the special favor of a government decision, and why other, or future, employees should be debarred from the enjoyment of that privilege.

There has never been a principle, designed to govern the actions and relations of men, against the application and enforcement of which there could not arise difficulties. And no principle has ever been successfully upheld by granting exceptions and immunity from its working. The application of the principle in the present instance would not have worked any harm, except to interested parties who the government cannot wish to protect in their violation American claims without losing the respect of loyal citizens of our Republic. The President's decision is not only perverse ethics, viewed from the standpoint of civil righteousness, but it is an egregious blunder, if it was meant as a political expedient.

An Opportunity for Subscribers

IN OUR widespread Family Circle, there are ma subscribers who, after the copy of THE CHRISTI HERALD which reaches their homes every week h been read by the members of the household, ma it do double duty by mailing it to some one e whom they wish to have the benefit of its good che This they do on the principle that we should sha our blessings with others less fortunately situat and doubtless a good deal of excellent missiona work is done in this way.

On our desk lies a letter from a subscriber many years' standing, who has long been in t habit of mailing his CHRISTIAN HERALD regula to a friend in another State. He usually does t a week or ten days after it reaches his own hon He writes very cordially and in closing says: appreciate the paper more than I can tell, for it h meant much to me and to my family all these yea in which it has ben coming to my home; but I f that it can do good work elsewhere, although I co fess I do not send it away without regret."

This letter is a sample of many of the same ki that we are constantly receiving from good frien who have learned to love THE CHRISTIAN HERA Now, there is a great difference between a copy THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fresh from the press a brimful of all the news of things happening God's world, and a copy that is a week or two o We have a proposition to make to these friends and we know there are thousands of them—whi will enable them to do their missionary work wi the paper at less cost and to better advantage, gi ing more satisfaction to themselves and addi greatly to the value of their gift. For every co of the paper which they remail to some other frie or acquaintance, not personally a subscriber, th pay an average of two cents postage. To-day T CHRISTIAN HERALD is a larger paper in the numb of its pages and the quantity of its reading matte and it weighs more than it ever did before. Th postage, added to their original subscription, mak a total outlay of $2.54 yearly. We now make t offer to every reader who desires to mail away h copy of the paper, to supply an extra copy regula every week at 75 cents a year, thus making t total subscription for two copies $2.25, and effecti a saving of 29 cents and giving his friend the pap fresh from the press every week, simultaneous with the receipt of his own copy. He thus has t advantage of placing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD whe he wants it while it is still new and up to date, i stead of sending away a back number at full posta rates, as he has been in the habit of doing.

We can afford to do this because THE CHRISTI HERALD is mailed from this office at pound rat instead of by the copy. It is hardly necessary point out the advantages of such an arrangeme and the satisfaction it will bring all around, b sides the saving of outlay to the original subscrib

To all such friends, we would further add—in fo warding your own renewal this year, send it in far ahead of time as possible. Very soon the tide renewals will be coming in in a steadily increasi volume, and it relieves the pressure on our Su scription Department to get the bulk of our su scriptions in early. Remember, you lose nothing anticipating your renewal date, as your subscri tion is simply put one year ahead from that dat Send in at the same time 75 cents additional, wi the full name and address of the friend, not now subscriber, whom you wish to benefit by your gene osity, and he or she will receive the paper for a f year from the date of subscription.

Terrible Tornado's Destruction

CYCLONES are of common occurrence in tropical countries; hurricanes are frequent in the flat districts of the West, but tornadoes in the New England and Middle Atlantic States are rare. It is said there was never one in Onondaga County, New York, till Sunday, September 22, when a terrific one swept over a large portion of that county, leaving death and destruction in its wake. It killed three persons, injured scores of others, and caused great destruction of property. Houses and barns were crushed like eggshells; acres and acres of crops were mowed in the fields; great trees, giant oaks, chestnuts, elms, and maples that had defied and grown in the storms of generations were uprooted or twisted and broken into tangled masses; buildings were whipped about like straws, turned upside down, or taken up bodily and carried long distances. The worst damage was done at Long Branch, near Syracuse. In 1904, St. Charles, Minn., a town of 10,000 inhabitants, was destroyed by a tornado, and nine persons were killed. Another terrible storm damaged Kirkville, Mo. Different scientific reasons for the origin of the tornado are given. It is believed that the conditions necessary for their production are a very humid atmosphere charged with electricity; a cold west or northwest wind blowing over the country, the line of its front extending southwest to northeast, and a mild southerly wind, very warm, blowing across the path of the cold west wind. Where these winds meet, the warm wind is suddenly elevated and cooled by expansion and mixture with cold air. A roll of heavy clouds is formed along the front of the cold west wind. At a favorable point, the upward rush of air and the indraft on all sides produce a spiral motion which whirls, and scatters, and crushes, and kills. There are terrible tornadoes in the mental and spiritual realm as well as in the material world, against whose damages wisdom and faith can provide ample safety. The tornado has a place in the economy of nature, and is an intelligent expression of divine power. The prophet thus expresses this thought:

The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet. (Nah. 1: 3.)

Immigrants East of Mississippi

THE last census of the United States gave the number of white persons of foreign birth at 13,345,545, of whom 5,000,000 had reached the country between 1901 and 1910. The other day Census Director Durand told how these 5,000,000 have been distributed. Of the number 2,155,772, or 43.1 per cent., are in the Middle Atlantic States; 1,012,417, or 20.2 per cent., in the east north central division, and 684,473, or 13.7 per cent., in the New England States. These three divisions, comprising the States lying north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, contain 3,852,662, or 77.1 per cent. of the immigrants who have come to this country since 1901. There were only 1,147,436, or 22.9 per cent., in the part of the country south of the Ohio and west of the Mississippi. The recent immigrants do not seem to be of as hopeful a class as some who came in earlier years. But with our system of education and the help of the churches we will Americanize them and make them tributary to our material, mental and religious progress. The prophet saw the benefits of the migrations of men.

Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased. (Dan. 12: 4.)

World's Enormous Grain Crop

EUROPEAN countries, as well as the United States and Canada, have the prospect of a phenomenal yield of grain this year, one that for wheat, rye, barley, oats and corn will show an increase over last year of from 5.7 to 17.8 per cent. According to the figures just received in this country from the International Institute of Agriculture in Rome, Italy, we learn that the preliminary estimate of the wheat production in France is 35,974,000 bushels; Roumania, 89,417,000; Canada, 206,033,000. The total production this year in the following named countries is given as 3.200,000,000 bushels, or 6.7 per cent. more than last year's production: Prussia, Belgium, Bulgaria, Denmark, Spain, Great Britain, Hungary, Italy, Luxemburg, Switzerland, France, Norway, Netherlands, Roumania, Russia, India, Japan, Egypt, Tunis, Canada and the United States. The total production of corn this year in the following named countries is given as 3,616,000,000 bushels, or 17 per cent. greater than last year; Hungary, not including Croatia and Slavonia, Bulgaria, Spain, Italy, Roumania, Russia, Switzerland, the United States, Japan and Egypt. The agricultural is the basis of all industries. Good crops are the surest prophecy of good times. God has blessed our nation with such bountiful harvests that there is no excuse for the wail of the pessimist even in a presidential election year, but rather cause for gratitude to the All-Father, and the recognition of new obligations to love and serve him. Such gratitude God required of the children of Israel at the end of the harvest:

And thou shalt observe the feast of weeks, of the first fruits of wheat harvest, and the feast of ingathering at the year's end. (Ex. 34: 22.)

Dangers of the Aeroplane

ON THE 21st of September three aviators were killed. One was Mr. H. J. D. Astley, a well-known aviator, who met with a fatal accident in a race with James Valentine at Belfast, Ireland. He fell from a height of 150 feet into a field filled with thousands of spectators. He died in a few moments. Mr. Astley was among the foremost monoplane pilots of the Royal Aero Club of Great Britain. He was the son of Lady Florence Heathcote Drummond Willoughby, daughter of the third Marquis Conyngham, and was twenty-four years old. On the same day two German military officers were killed while flying near Freiberg in Saxony. The machine was piloted by Lieutenant Berger, who was carrying Lieutenant Junghans as a passenger from Chemnitz to Berlin. In the struggle for the mastery of the air there is a fearful toll of precious lives, and it will be heavier still before the upper air has been conquered. There is much loss of life due to reckless aerial navigation, but the perils of the airship are very great when there is the greatest prudence manifested. The successes of the airship have been such as to cause the nations to adopt it as a new instrument of war. England, France and Germany proved in recent maneuvers that the epoch of aerial navigation is at hand. Already the British admiralty is experimenting with an armored covering for the funnels, engine rooms and hatchways of its new dreadnoughts, and special weapons are being designed to protect the warships against aerial attack. The British admiralty has decided to arm vessels with high-angle guns to carry seven miles to puncture the warships of the air. There is more hope to the world from the white-winged doves of peace than from the airbirds of war. It is the prayer of the Christian civilized world that the words of the Psalmist may be verified:

He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth. (Ps. 46: 9.)

Fears Race Deterioration

DR. FORBES ROSS, the well-known cancer expert of London, says that in two thousand years the English, under the present kind of legislation, will become a nation of degenerates and criminals. He claims that the heavy burdens of taxation have fallen on the higher classes, compelling them to have small families, while the land is peopled by the children of the lower classes, who have the primordial instincts and traits. We take serious exception to the premises of Dr. Ross, and must reject his conclusions that the race is deteriorating, going back to savagery and crime. There is the most marked progress of the English-speaking races in physical health and comeliness, in longevity, in intellectual ability, in education, in culture, in spiritual faculty, and in devotion to and imitation of the Perfect Man, in obedience to the injunctions of the apostle:

Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. (Eph. 4: 13.)

Radium in Colorado

HENRI CHAGNOUX, the eminent French mineralogist expert of the Biological Laboratory "du Radium" in Paris, has just returned to Denver from Meeker, Col., where he claims to have found the greatest natural supply of radium in the world. He spent some time at Meeker examining lands and ores said to contain the precious metal which Madame Curie, the French scientist, discovered in 1906. Chagnoux, who does not speak English, through an interpreter gave an interview to the Denver reporters, which was sent by telegraph to the whole world. Up to the present time the minerals containing the richest deposits of radium compound have been found exclusively in Europe, in countries like Portugal, Bohemia, Austria, and Russia on the borders of Siberia. The minerals which contain uranite (or pitchblende) are clereite, gummite, ellasite, hatchetolite, blomstrandite, antunite, and uranospinite. Time will tell whether the French scientist has found a sufficient supply of the precious metal to make its extraction worth while. The Promised Land, like Colorado, was rich in mineral products.

A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack anything in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass. (Deut. 8: 9.)

THE REWARDS OF FAITH*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE mother who came to Jesus, praying that he would cure her little daughter, was a Syrophenician. She belonged to a proud race, dominant at that time. Their principal city was Tyre, which has been compared with Babylon for magnificence and for its wealth, which consisted largely of ships laden with cedar wood, silks, valuable dye-stuffs, etc. We are not told that Christ during his ministry ever entered Tyre, but only that he went to "the borders of Tyre and Sidon," another great Phœnician city. We are told that "he entered into a house." Into whose house? Certainly not that of a Syrophenician, but of a Jew. Why had Jesus left Palestine, even temporarily? It is generally supposed that it was because of the persecution of the Scribes and Pharisees, and so unfriendly critics have said itwas "a cowardly retreat." Friendly writers have said that it was "to teach his apostles that they must not at random, or unreasonably, or without sufficient object, encounter dangers." That this was a part of his plan we must believe, because he would have no man know that he was in the house where he had taken refuge. But let us take a broad view, even that he had gone there that the Gospel might be proclaimed to the Syrophenicians, and he chose that a woman and a child should be the medium. As we read the story, we are continually reminded of the woman at the well through whom Jesus gained access to the Samaritan nation. But there is a great contrast between the two nations; the Samaritans were a despised race, and the woman was of unsavory reputation; on the other hand, as said before, the Syrophenicians were a proud and prosperous people, and the woman herself was a faithful mother. The manner in which she approached Jesus betokened that she was a person of good breeding. We are indebted to Madam Layyah Barakat, herself a Syrophenician, for enlightenment on this line. She personally explained to us this incident, referring us to the account given in Matthew 15: 21-28, rather than to the less detailed account in St. Mark's Gospel.

THE CANAANITE WOMAN

From a Painting by Jacopo Palma (Il Vecchio)

Madame Barakat says: "There are three greetings among Orientals: first, that of young persons meeting their elders, when the youth grasps the hand of the older person, carries it to his lips, and then to his forehead (this the woman of Canaan did not do). The second greeting is when one meets a person in authority; there is a folding of arms, a low bow, with downcast eyes, afterwards a request sometimes being made. The third kind of salutation is that given to God alone, when the body is prostrated and the face brought to the ground. The Syrophenician mother, when she first addressed Jesus, gave him the second form of salutation. She met him as the son of a great king, a renowned healer of diseases; but that was not enough, and so Jesus "answered her not a word." It was not until she prostrated herself before him and acknowledged him as her Lord that he granted healing to her little daughter. Her proud race-feeling so entirely gave way that she was willing to be classed as "a dog." There is no animal so despised as a dog in the East; nowhere in all the world are dogs so hungry as they are in the Orient. Madame Barakat tells us that when she was a child and sometimes found herself almost late for the mission school, she would not wait for breakfast, but would take a piece of bread, not thicker than paper, and roll it together that she might break off little pieces to eat as she went along. At such times she was generally followed by one dog or more that picked up the small crumbs she dro by the way. The Syrophenician mother was ing even to be as a dog for the help of Jesus.

It is sometimes stated that Jesus for a while layed his help in order that he might give his a tles a lesson in patience, but we are disposed think it was rather to bring the woman to the p of confessing him before men, that when the m aculous cure of the child should be publis throughout Phœnicia, to God should be given glory. We are told in the Bible of the wonde result of Jesus' mission to the Samaritans wh followed his meeting with the woman at the w We are not told that any great number of Pho cians became the lowers of Christ im diatelyafter the heal of the little daugh but we do know t when Barnabas Paul preached the G pel to the Phœnicia many of them beca Christians, and t showed great res ance when the Moha medans came down l a wolf on the fold.

The Healing of the C turion's Servant

Jesus was brou into contact with other power when Roman centurion (c tain over one hundr soldiers) came to hi begging him that would heal his valu servant who was s of the palsy. Though Roman, we must thi that he was a believ in the Lord Jesus the Son of God, for said to Jesus when made his request, am a man under autho ity," that of the Rom emperor. More th this, he said: "I al am a man under autho ity," thus acknowled ing that Jesus himse was the exponent of higher power, even the God of earth and heave The centurion, such was his implicit faith, d not ask Jesus to come to his home to heal h servant, only that he should speak the word, and h would be made well. And Jesus said to the ce turion: "Go thy way; as thou hast believed, so l it done unto thee." And the servant was healed that same hour. A memorial has come down a through the ages, for that same centurion testif ing to his faith in the Lord Jesus in the form of synagogue which he built for the Jews. Even t day there are beautifully carved fragments of it be seen at Capernaum. So the testimony in ston has been given by the centurion, not only to t Romans, but to people of all lands who travel to t

OUR SUNDAY-SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

[Show this to some Sunday school superintendent and tell him he is invited to contribute to this new "Round Table" a statement, as brief as if he were putting it in a telegram, of any success he has had, large or small, in solving any of the Sunday school superintendents' problems: punctuality, getting new members and steady attendance, order, saving bad boys, making music tell, getting full supply of good teachers, conversions, getting Christians to work. Address Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.]

—THE SUPERINTENDENT OF one of the most successful Sunday schools in the world, Mr. Frank L. Brown, of the Bushwick Avenue M. E. Church, Brooklyn, tells in the following paragraph how it has made good. It is worth while to read carefully every word he says, for it was because of his good work in his own school that the World's Sunday School Association sent him to organize American Sunday school work in the Philippines and to improve Sunday school work in Japan, and has recently made him secretary of a national Commission on Adolescence and general field secretary.

—THE BEST WAY OF increasing the Sunday school attendance is to increase the interest and take care of the membership already on the books. This is common sense and good business. We have tested it out at Bushwick Avenue, where we take in from ten to twenty new scholars a Sunday without offering a reward. The contest plan—red and blue, pink and white, or yellow and green—will not of itself build up a school. The new additions will melt away after the excitement of the contest is passed unless there is a teacher on the job who gets those scholars "upon her sole," and that means foot work as well as knee work. And the department superintendent must have the genius of attaching a scholar by a public introduction; a welcome letter sent to the scholar and parents as well; the birthday recognition; the department or school button; the social; the outing. From a membership of 80 to 3,600 in twenty-six years, besides establishing and maintaining for years three missions with an additional membership of 1,500, is the record of Bushwick Avenue. And this is the result of business methods, pleased members, visited homes, school atmosphere, training for service. From 4,000 to 5,000 decisions for Christ have occurred from the school membership in these years. Intensive plans have been followed, such as a good program, class organization, large attention to the week-day life, graded lessons, training of teachers, wholesome recreation, employment department. The school has sought to individualize and follow the scholar, and that scholar and his folks have become warm friends and allies of the school. "The best advertisement is a pleased customer." Our school motto is, "We seek the best," and its business adages are: "Once a visitor, always a friend," "A place, and the right place, for every member of the family." And once a member is "on the hooks" the drive is made to atmosphere that life for Christ and his service.

—THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN Association International Boys' Secretary tells in the Sunday School Journal for July of the great success of the Association in using older boys, fifteen to twenty years of age, for teachers of younger boys from ten to twelve. Why not group the boys from sixteen upward in a training class that will study the lesson one week ahead of others, and methods of teaching also, from which teachers for classes of younger boys can be taken as substitutes first, and later for permanent teachers?

—AT A MINISTER'S table in Baltimore, the Sunday school being under discussion, the young daughter, "sweet sixteen," remarked: "All the young men I know of seventeen and eighteen have left Sunday school because they think they are too old to stay with the 'kids'; and when I ask them why they don't go into the Bible class, they say the men are too old for them." Look to your records and see if it is not about the weakest spot in your school, the later 'teens, sixteen to nineteen, the very years when full adolescence creates altruism, the most favorable time for religious decision, as a wide investigation a few years ago showed. It is just t time when consciousness of new manho makes a young fellow least willing to be in class with younger fellows. The boys from s teen to nineteen ought to be by themselves, a they ought to have for teachers the stronge Christian men in the church.

—WE MIGHT AS WELL face the fact on bot sides of the sea that keeping up Sunday scho attendance in large cities, with trolleys an automobiles and other Sunday pleasurings pul ing against us, is a strenuous task. Sever whole denominations in Great Britain report heavy loss, and now comes the steady and co servative Northern Presbyterian Church of t United States reporting, in a "Call to Arms, that in sixteen of the largest cities of th United States, in which one-fifth of the d nominational Sunday school membership found, and in which the churches have gaine almost fifty-five thousand members in te years, the Sunday school gain in that lon period is only 1,095. These ten great citie have grown enormously in population, but i New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Baltimor Cincinnati, St. Paul and Washington, D. C the Presbyterian Sunday schools are actuall smaller in number than ten years ago, and th average gain per year for the sixteen cities i seven each—much less than one addition ne per year for each school.

SNAPSHOTS WITH THE BIBLE

BY A. R. STARK

Callao, Peru

The Open Door

Seeking Entrance

At the Gipsy Tent

MORNING breaks gray and chilly in the winter season in Lima and Callao. The first sound that falls upon the ear out among the chacras is the cry of the lechero and rero (milkman and vegetable vender), who, as enter town, urge their donkeys and horses on voice and blow. The wild cry and kindly one-conversation of the Spanish-speaking arriero er) with his animals once heard can never be otten. Hola mula! Hacho mula! Mula ca-a! are a few of the familiar epithets of the y arriero. Hielo! Hielo! is the lusty shout of echero, with his tins of milk strapped to the of his beast. Panadero! panadero! is the far-ing cry of the baker, who, like his compañero lechero, advances, despatching his stores of l out of curious panniers made of hide which, ey swing to and fro, make a bump, bump noise ey strike the horse's side.

ndas are open at early hours for the workmen wish a cup of coffee. The cocineras (cooks) een returning from the market with their well-ed baskets of fruit and vegetables. Bells have calling devotees to early mass. Women with ast eye and devout air, with little girl ser-s, are wending their way to church.

t us too accompany the Bible-seller in the early ing as he threads his way along narrow ts across old Inquisition Plaza. Let us make way through the throngs to one of the en-es of the fine new Lima market, and care not e jostle with cholo, Indian or Chinese. There stand with copies of la Biblia in their hands.

The clear ringing voice of Palaci carries through the market, anon it is the more subdued tone of Reyes or Espinosa. A busy throng of buyers passes to and fro. Will any stand and examine what these men are selling? Yes, an illustration on the cover of a Spanish New Testament or the bright colors of a Gospel attract the eye, the earnest words of the sellers arrest men, and an attentive crowd is being held. Parts of the sacred Word ring in the ears, pithy explanations follow. "Falso! Falso!" cries out some fanatic. "No," replies the colporteur; "come with me to Protestant lands where the Bible has entered into the home and its teachings into the heart. How they have advanced in education and social progress while we lag far behind in superstition, ignorance and moral degradation." Purchases are made, twenty, thirty or even forty copies of the Gospels are sometimes sold, and a number of New Testaments. "Viva la Biblia" shouts some ardent young buyer as he waves his book on high, and the colporteurs take up the refrain, "Viva la Biblia!" in South America.

We pass on from this cinematographic crowd with its strange babel and jargon of tongues to another part of the city. This is where the Bible woman left a Gospel last week. They stepped down on the sunken brick floor of a little fruit shop. With a welcoming smile a stout woman appeared from behind the canvas screen. "I looked for you to come soon," she said, "the words you read and talked of are ever present with me. I want the two Gospels San Lucas and San Juan and next week I think to take a Testamento."

A gray-haired little man left off his minor chant, rose from the piano and opened the door. With serious air and frowning countenance, he bade us enter and take away the Book, whose words throb with life, that had been left the week before. "Take it away. Take it away!"—his eyes were flashing—"it is false, false. What is the Santa Biblia without notes? What is it without the purification of la Virgen? It is mala, mala!" (bad, bad). And there he stood, his hand thrown out in protest and averted head. "No, say no more, I will not listen." "Señor, we leave you, next time you will have thought of the words we have spoken and you will perhaps listen to God's message. Adios."

In the circo de animales the white bear rolled on its back and clawed the plaster off the mud wall; a black bear turned a surly head as we approached and several fierce dogs barked their loudest. "Stand back, stand back, from the black bear!" shouted the gipsy in charge as we came up, Glad to obey, we chatted to him of the Bible we carried as his scissors clipped off tufts of hair from his little boy's head. Performing monkeys and little dogs in boxes had drawn plenty of children into the corral to see the circo de animales, and we were not long in getting a crowd of boys in the manager's tent. Colporteur Reyes made good use of his opportunity. At another corner, a Hungarian gipsy woman listened at her door and smoked her pipe contentedly as we talked. She then told us of her gipsy home, her religion and her wanderings for twenty years in South America. The Bible women also told her of the Book they carried and of its story of love to gipsies as well as to all the world.

OUTSIDE THE GATE

BY ANNA E. FINN

PART SECOND

T WAS not until after dinner, when the four had returned to form a group around the fire, that the subject of Ivonson's son came up. It had been Easton himself who introduced, earin the evening, talk and inquiries about things he navy; and so easily, so cheerfully did he k that "Mugs" at first looked at him in quesng surprise. Could it be true, after all, that on had no regrets, that he was "making good" prospering? Somehow it was hard to think of and Anne out of the service life. He had r forgotten those last weeks when Easton and lf were upper class men, when they were iting the superintendent's action on the secre-'s recommendation; those days of apparent d indifference, those nights when he would be kened hearing Easton going over the two-five, two-forty-nine problem in his sleep. But Eashimself had led the talk to-night to naval matand after dinner "Mugs" mentioned the case vonson's son.

"wo congressmen have taken the thing up and going to bring it before a committee in Washon, but it looks pretty black for the boy. What eeds is some able lawyer to defend him. The -priced ones are beyond the widowed mother."

Easton sat forward on the edge of his chair.

"Ivonson's son! Not 'little Pete?'" he said.

"Mugs" nodded.

"Makes one feel ancient, doesn't it? He was in kilts in our second class year."

"And Ivonson is dead?"

"Mugs" nodded gravely.

"A year before Pete got his appointment. You remember him, don't you?"

"Remember him! It isn't likely I'd ever forget him. He was on my board, and he treated me square."

A hush fell on the little group. Anne leaned forward and lowered the lamp, pretending that it smoked. Except to her, Easton had never spoken of his own case since the day when he had passed the gate. After all, though, it was only "Mugs" and Mary.

The guests sat silent. Something in Easton's voice thrilled them.

"Square!" he repeated slowly. Then his mood changed. He came back to the fire and leaned against the end of the mantel.

"What's the matter with Pete?" he asked.

"Mugs" looked at Mary swiftly, then to Anne, whom he had known all her life, then to Easton.

"Williams is superintendent now, you know," he explained. "Of course you remember him. I don't believe they ever had a meaner man for commandant than he made in our day. He's an admiral now; perhaps you didn't know they are sending more rank to fill the billet now. He never did care for Ivonson, and, as far as I can learn from Smith, who is there in seamanship now, he doesn't care for Pete; seems to have shifted his dislike from father to son. Smith says it's a rank shame. Pete's room-mate came down with diphtheria and was carried to the hospital, and Pete was kept quarantined for two weeks just before the "semi-an," when the class work is important—you know how it is—and then when they let him out his little sister Maggie—you remember her—died, and he went all to pieces. Smith said the boy did bone—his seamanship work showed it—but somehow he's short on 'nav,' and—"

"Mugs" broke off and looked straight to Easton. A slow, inscrutable smile crept across Easton's thin, lined face.

"And Williams is going to 'bilge' him on a two-forty-nine."

"I guess that's about the straight of it," he said.

OUTSIDE THE GATE

"Of course Williams will be there before the committee. He has a pretty smooth tongue. Pete's lucky to have two congressmen to get him a reconsideration, but he hasn't retained any attorney to handle his case. Smith says he will be dropped."

Mary looked up from the fire.

"It will break his mother's heart."

Anne was silent, watching Easton. His face in shadow, hidden from the others, looked as she had seen it sometimes when, turning from the faded photograph of the gate, he had sought distraction in his violin, when he had played on and on, and finally drawn his bow across the vibrant strings in one low sobbing note.

When the guests had gone, he drew her to him to the big chair by the fire.

"Some day you will know how I enjoyed the evening, how proud I was of everything, but to-night—to-night I must think—think—" He looked at her, a strange fire in his eyes.

"How much cash have we on hand?" he asked suddenly.

She leaned over to the desk and took from one of the pigeonholes a much thumbed little account-book and showed him the meager balance.

"It is not enough," he said; "not half enough!"

She did not question him. Again she only waited. He looked around the room. Once he picked up her left hand and fingered the small diamond resting near the wedding ring.

"It's a pretty little stone," he said, half tenderly, half pityingly, "but it wouldn't be enough—"

And then her silence broke.

"David! David! What is it? What has happened?"

He smiled a little and stroked her hair.

"There's really only one thing in this place worth while—after you and Boy—" He broke off.

"You mean—your violin?" she said very slowly.

"Yes, the violin."

Then silence fell and she trembled in his arms.

"What—what must we sell it for?"

"We won't quite sell it, dear," he said. "We'll just raise money on it—although the Villier Company offered me five hundred for it last year. We won't consider it sold. It has been in my mother's family seven generations. Some one of the blood always played on it, although never like its first master. I want it for the Boy. Perhaps we can put it up for two hundred and get it back. Yes, two hundred should be enough."

She did not speak. She could not, but she knelt beside him, her face hidden in his coat.

"Ivonson was the only one, outside your father," he went on, "who tried to influence the superintendent and Williams and the board for Elkhart and me. Elkhart's dead now, but I've lived on, and I've never 'made good'—to life, or myself, or you, or the Boy; but now—" He broke off and she threw her arms around him, sobbing.

"You've given a life of devotion, David. It's all I need or want. Most women have so much less of the things that really count."

"I've never 'made good,'" he persisted, looking with somber eyes over her bowed head into the dead fire.

"Who's ever given you a chance?" she demanded fiercely.

He smiled slowly.

"The chance doesn't ever seem to have come, does it, little girl?—although I've waited day after day in that room across the river."

"And now?" she questioned.

"The chance isn't for me," he answered, "but the chance has come to try to repay Ivonson. Elkhart isn't here to help; I must work for both. Ivonson died and left that little woman all alone except for Pete and Maggie, and then Maggie went, and there's no one to help her or Pete, no one to plead his case. We'll put up the fiddle, Anne, and I'll go to Washington in new clothes and with a prosperous air, and we shall see what we can do for Pete."

The testimony was all in. The men grouped around the long table in the Committee Room considered the case nearly closed. Williams was there, and others of the board, and even Chief of Bureau Gunper had been called in as an authority on precedent at the academy, since once, years ago, he had been superintendent. He had not recognized Easton on entering—a superintendent cannot remember cadet faces so long, especially when changed by the long years. Easton had acknowledged his presence by a grave inclination of the head, outwardly unmoved, but inwardly, for one brief instant, the enforced calmness of the years had been broken. It was not until he rose and stood facing them in the strong light that the chief of bureau fancied he recognized something familiar about the man.

"Gentlemen"—the voice, low, far-reaching, broke the silence of the room—"there are a few points I wish you to consider in connection with your findings in this case—a few points upon which I think more light might be justly thrown." The words fell slowly, arousing sudden interest in the hearers, but no idea on the part of the board that its decision could be altered, nor hope on the part of the congressmen or the young midshipman present for a favorable result. Easton addressed himself to neither the chief of bureau nor the superintendent, nor did he appear to notice the still, white-faced boy, whom he remembered as a romping child. He spoke, for the most part, to them all, sometimes referring specially to a member of the board or to the congressmen present. He reviewed briefly the technicalities of the case, showing a depth of knowledge of the facts of the situation that aroused admiration but gave little promise for the case in hand. The superintendent looked bored, as did the chief of bureau. The board was tired and eager for the final closing. The congressmen glanced at each other and frowned a little, remembering young Ivonson's mother whom they had known in girlhood—in fact, one of them had loved her then. Ivonson sat, pale and inert.

Easton laid his few brief notes down upon the table before him. They fancied he was through. Watching him in a half-curious way, they saw him take a deep breath as he raised his head slowly, and the thought struck several present that his head was finely shaped. The forehead was broad and high; the eyes inscrutable.

"Gentlemen!" His voice was vibrant now. It reached for their wandering attention and tracked it as a dog tracks its prey, bringing it back and holding it in thrall. The dry technicalities he had reviewed were forgotten, as were forgotten the brief notes beside him. He used no gesture, standing tall and very still, one hand resting on the edge of the long committee table. He had no trick of manner. It was his voice, tense, earnest, true, that poured into their minds, their veins, their hearts, as an electric current runs over lands and under seas, and knows no turning from its purpose.

He paused. The board and the congressmen leaned forward. The chief of bureau and the superintendent glanced at each other, remembering. Ivonson's son raised a white face. His mouth was working queerly. The broad shaft of sunmotes shot from the long high window to the floor.

"Gentlemen!" And once again that voice wrought its spell. It wooed them persuasively, as warm skies and forest streams woo vagrant schoolboys in the spring; it possessed them, it controlled them; it won with tenderness, it denounced with fine, cool scorn. It played upon the heartstrings the whole scale of human emotions, up and down, drawing the bow of imagination across the taut strings of justice and of reason, until the measure that it played, weighed down with the burden of human wrong, seemed too great a thing to listen to and live. He stopped, as a musician stops with bow suspended in the middle of an impassioned strain, only to lay it again across the strings.

They listened until the voice became a thing to swerve them from their purpose, to remold their wills, to teach them reason—to yield—to yield—to yield to his power at last.

"Gentlemen!" It spoke to them each in turn now, and it was as though each man was chosen from all others and stood alone in a vast void, listening, yielding to that voice that filled the gap. "Gentlemen!" the congressmen listened. "Gentlemen!" it was addressed to the board now. "Gentlemen!" the superintendent, whiter than Ivonson's son, whom the voice alone ignored, listened, knowing it was for him. "Gentlemen!" it called the chief of bureau; and although he sat outwardly quiet in the flesh, his soul, recognizing its victim and its master, answered "Here."

It was Easton who went over to young Ivonson and walked with him into the adjoining room, following the congressmen, when the board cleared the room for deliberation. In that inner room they awaited the decision.

The congressman who had loved young Ivonson's mother stepped up to Easton.

"Are you thinking of making a change in your affairs?"

Easton looked up. He had been talking very quietly to Ivonson's son.

"A change? You mean—"

"You know what I mean. Will you come and talk it over in my office later?"

From Easton's lined face, his somber eyes looked back into the other man's. He read there what assured him that hardship and failure and privation were things of the past. He thought of Anne and the Boy. He read, too, in the congressman's eyes that dishonor was to form no part of the contract they were about to make.

"Yes," he said.

In the committee room the board pushed back their chairs. The superintendent had been overruled. He stood smiling sarcastically, tapping the ferrule of his cane against his boot.

The chief of bureau crossed the room to the western window, through which earlier in the day the sunmotes had streamed in. They were gone now. There was a chill in the air. The shadows in the room were deepening.

"Great heavens!" he said below his breath, and staring into nothingness. "I never heard anything like that!"

After his session with the congressman a telegram preceded Easton as he set out on the journey home. He climbed his stairs and unlatched the door. The picture of the gate still faced him, tall, beautiful, with the outline of the trees beyond—the life within; the gate for him forever closed.

But beyond the picture of the gate and its shadow he saw the Boy waiting for him, and behind the Boy, Anne, with love and triumph in her eyes.

HIGH PRICES IN OLDEN TIMES

VE ARE apt to think of the high cost of living as a very modern problem because we are in the midst of one of e periods of high prices which, one transient cause or another, visited humanity all through re- ed history. Even the caveman oubt sometimes complained of the sive labor involved in the gath- of roots and mussels, and the nan perhaps grumbled at the toll rampum exacted by the ancient w-maker. However it may have before history was recorded, e is no doubt that these periods of prices have occurred at intervals e world's history ever since the when Joseph in Egypt doled out to a starving world. We may be that when Solomon made silver e as stones in Jerusalem prices have soared, and the poor must been ground between the upper the nether millstone.

ie clearest ancient record of a e of high prices and a systematic npt to stem it is that of the Em- r Diocletian of Rome and his . In the year 301 A.D. this em- r, the arch-persecutor who sent sands of Christians to martyr- within a few years, issued an in which he laid down maximum s for all the articles of daily use. ven regulated the price of labor, ng the maximum daily wage of nskilled laborer at 10.8 cents per and board.

ocletian was a man of humble n, unlettered and of boorish hab- and would not live in Rome for of being laughed at by the cul- l patricians for his uncouth h and manners. The bombastic incoherent style of the introduc- to the edict makes it one of the extraordinary specimens of n literature. It may well have a product of Diocletian's own pen. ie first fragment of this edict was vered in 1709, and since then r fragments have been unearthed Egypt, Asia Minor and Greece. mmsen, the celebrated historian, pieced together these fragments published a reconstruction.

rofessor Frank Frost Abbott of ceton University in his book The mon People of Ancient Rome as. Scribner's Sons, New York), given the prices laid down in edict in American dollars and s and the commodities in Ameri- weights and measures. This slation enables us to compare the ent prices with those of to-day. e are the prices of a few selected cles of food:

he modern prices given above are e which prevail in New York City he present time. It will be readily erstood that the wide ranges of es given in some instances repre- different qualities of the foods ied and those fluctuations of price ch take place from day to day, in ts, eggs and butter, etc.

interesting comparison with e the following table of daily es may be taken:

	301 A.D.	1912 A.D.
rer	Board and 10.8 cents	$2.00

ter	Board and 32.4 cents	4.00
ksmith	Board and 21.6 cents	3.20
builder	Board and 21 to 26 cents	3.50

ome workmen, who had their own os or places of business, did not re- e their board as part of their wage. these, the barber was entitled to charge not more than nine cents for a shave; the tailor could charge twenty-six and one-tenth cents for making "an overgarment of first quality"; the writer might receive ten and nine-tenths cents for one hundred lines; the elementary teacher twenty-one and six-tenths cents per pupil per month. The lawyer could exact a retainer of one dollar and nine cents and a total fee of four dollars and thirty-five cents. The cabby was entitled to a fare of nine cents a mile for one passenger.

Of the rather remarkable differences in the prices of clothing the following will serve as examples:

Boots for peasants	52 cents
Soldiers' boots	43 cents
Patrician's shoes	65 cents
Women's boots	26 cents
Mantles and robes	$6.52 to $26.08
Tunics with sleeves	$8.70

The Roman carpenter of the fourth century at 21 cents a day and board received only about one-ninth or one-fifteenth as much as the American carpenter of to-day, whose wage ranges from $2.50 to $4 per day, while pork and beef cost about one-third of their present price, and other articles, though vastly less than our present prices, much more in comparison to the wages received. The lot of the workingman, therefore, must have been almost intolerable, and Professor Abbott finds it hard to understand how he managed to keep soul and body together. The answer to the problem which this raises may perhaps be found in the public distribution of grain to the citizens; for it is history that in Imperial Rome the bread-line was one of the permanent institutions.

One may well ask what was the outcome of this attempt to reduce the cost of living. The answer is given by Lactantius in a book entitled On the Deaths of Those Who Persecuted. He says: "And when he had brought on a state of exceeding high prices by his different acts of injustice, he tried to fix by law the prices of articles offered for sale. Thereupon, for the veriest trifles, much blood was shed, and out of fear nothing was offered for sale, and the scarcity grew much worse, until after the death of many persons the law was repealed from mere necessity."

Like all attempts to resist the workings of natural laws, this effort to restrict the operation of the law of supply and demand was a hideous failure from the start. Although the edict laid down the penalty of death for the seller and the same penalty for the buyer as an accomplice, that relentless law of economics, which proclaims that the price of any commodity shall be fixed by the amount of it which is offered for sale in the market and the demand for it by the public, held its own, and after a short time the edict was repealed.

But what were the workingmen of the fourth century doing to alleviate their hard lot? This Professor Abbott tells us in a chapter entitled "Some Reflections on Corporations and Trade Guilds." It seems that the Roman workingman in his tradesunion was organized not for the purpose of raising wages or of protecting himself in case of differences of opinion with his employer but to mitigate his hopeless lot by the amenities of social life. Many of the inscriptions uncovered in various parts of the Roman Empire record the collection of sums of money to defray the expense of banquets, or the funerals of deceased members. About 2,500 inscriptions have been found which deal with workmen's organizations. There were more than eighty trade guilds in the city of Rome alone. Each guild had a patron deity, as, for instance, Bacchus for the innkeepers, and Silvanus, god of the woods, for the carpenters. A similar custom still obtains among the Latins, and St. John ante portam Latinam is at this day the patron saint of the printers.

The Word "AND" in Choppers

Remember "AND." It tells you to buy a Meat AND Food Chopper, which is what you really want, instead of merely a Food Chopper.

THE ENTERPRISE
Meat AND Food Chopper

chops meat and other food into tender morsels, delightful to the taste. Their nutritive values are more easily taken up by the system. Think, too, of the economy in being able to use "left-overs" and little "bits" that would otherwise be thrown away.

It is the one chopper that gives the chopping cut—does not squeeze, mangle or crush. Its four-bladed chopping knife cuts cleanly and rapidly.

Family size, $1.75 Large size, $2.50

If you want a still lower-priced machine, our standard pattern Enterprise Food Chopper will give satisfaction.

PRESIDENT SUSTAINS NUNS' GARB

The full text of Mr. Taft's order, directing that the present wearers of religious garb are not to be discharged, but that in future school appointments the garb will be forbidden, is given below:

IN JANUARY of this year, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs issued an order to superintendents in charge of Indian schools, directing that all insignia of any denomination be removed from all public rooms of such schools, and that the members of any denomination wearing a distinctive garb should not wear it while engaged in lay duties as government employees. Although the propriety of such an order had been under the consideration of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and although the secretary had submitted the matter to me for discussion, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs finally acted on his own responsibility, without having first received the approval of either the secretary or myself. Because of this circumstance I directed that the order be revoked and that action by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be suspended until such time as to permit a full hearing to be given to all parties in interest and a conclusion be reached in respect to the matter after full deliberation. Accordingly the Secretary of the Interior has given a very full hearing to the parties in interest, and printed arguments have been presented.

In the first place, it appears that all religious insignia have already been removed from the walls of government schools by the voluntary action of those who put them there before the schools were transferred to the government, and no question arises, therefore, with respect to such insignia, and no order is necessary. The issue, therefore, is confined to the question whether those persons engaged in teaching Indians in the government Indian schools, and who are members of the government civil service, should be required to lay off their distinctive religious garb while they render service as government teachers.

The Secretary of the Interior, after a very full and patient consideration, has reached the conclusion, stated in a letter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that the order ought not to be made, and that those persons who are now engaged in teaching in government schools as members of the government civil service, and who are wearing the garb, should be permitted to remain in the service and while discharging their duties to wear the garb. I concur in this view, and the order as revoked will not be revived.

The Secretary of the Interior goes into a very full discussion of the whole history of the conditions surrounding the teaching in government Indian schools. It is evident that at first the government gave very little care or attention to the teaching of Indians, and was quite willing to accept the services of any religious denomination engaged in missionary work which would take charge of the education of Indians and give them sectarian teaching, and we all should be most grateful to those denominations who were willing to spend the money and the effort not only to educate but to instil moral and religious principles in the young Indians who were wards of the government. After a time, however, it evidently became the policy of the government itself to assume the burden of the education of the Indians and to direct what it should consist in, and it is evident from acts of Congress that it was and is the settled intention of Congress that the general education of the Indians shall be secular and non-sectarian and that their religious instruction shall be separate and left to the volition of the Indians and to the care of the denominations to whose communion they belong. But in this transition state, in which the Indian youth are being transferred from sectarian to government instruction, the ultimate purpose has not always been strictly held in view, and it has been a frequent method to transfer a whole school, previously under a Protestant or Catholic denomination, to government control, and to include, in the transfer, all the teachers who had been engaged in this work in the sectarian schools and to incorporate them as a whole and as individuals in the classified civil sevice of the government. The transfers thus have often been effected by the government's renting denominational schools and taking over the whole plant and the teachers as well. It appears that out of 2,000 teachers in the Indian schools there are 51 who wear a religious garb and who are regularly classified members of the government civil service. To direct them to give up their religious garb would necessarily cause their leaving the service because of the vows under which they have assumed that garb.

The Secretary of the Interior holds, as a matter of congressional policy, that all orders hereafter made should be directed toward securing the secular and non-sectarian character of teaching; that this is the evident purpose of Congress from its legislation. He holds, further, that the wearing of a distinctive religious garb is not, as claimed by some before him, a violation of any constitutional limitation in respect to religion; that it does not violate the freedom of religion; that it does not constitute an established religion; and it does not prevent or impair the separation of church and state. He sustains this view by reference to the authority of a well-considered case decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. He therefore finds that to allow the present members of the civil service who wear a distinctive garb to remain in the service until such time as their service may end, either by resignation, separation for cause, disability, or by death, is not forbidden by existing law or statute, and that while the method of transfers was a mistaken one, the circumstances surrounding them constitute an equity in favor of those who are now in the service and are wearing the garb which should prevent their being excluded from the service by such an inhibition.

On the other hand, he finds that while the wearing of the religious garb is not a violation of the constitutional limitations referred to, a regulation forbidding the wearing of such garb by teachers to be hereafter appointed would be equitable, reasonable, and within the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe. This conclusion he establishes by reference to two well-considered cases, one by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania and the other by the Court of Appeals of New York. In the exercise of his lawful discretion as Secretary of the Interior, therefore, and in order more certainly to secure purely non-sectarian teaching in the schools, the evident object and aim of congressional legislation on the subject, he believes it wiser that hereafter no such transfers in solido of school plant and teachers of any denomination to the government school should be made, and that no set of teachers wearing distinctive religious garb should be by order in the future incorporated into the government civil service of teachers. His opinion is that, while it is neither unlawful nor impossible for teachers in a distinctly religious garb to do non-sectarian teaching, it makes as between denominations interested that only secular teaching be given, for more apparent equality of treatment not to increase or to add to those now in the service who wear a religious and denominational garb. Those representing the denomination of the teachers having religious garbs disclaim any intention of submitting any more such teachers for examination as eligibles under the civil service rules. No order or rule, therefore, seems necessary to carry this purpose of the secretary into effect.

A Famous Singer's Seventieth Birthday

ONE of Sweden's most noted women, Christine Neilson, celebrated her seventieth birthday on the 20th of last August. Not since the days of Jenny Lind has any singer more completely won her way into the heart of the music-loving world, not only in her own country but in other lands as well. Though Christine Neilson, or Countess de Casa Miranda, to give her married name, has reached the age of threescore and ten, her friends assert that her voice is still sweet and clear, though not so powerful as in other years. That the world had not forgotten the day when she charmed it with her songs was proved by the telegrams that came in a constant stream all through the day from noted persons. The king and queen of her native land sent their congratulations, and from the musical and dramatic societies of Sweden there came congratulations and great offerings of roses. The town of Gardsby, where the countess was staying, made the occasion a little festival and was decorated with bunting and garlands. In the evening fireworks were a feature of the celebration.

Christine Neilson was one of six sisters, and through her childhood knew well what it was to be limited in this world's possessions. Her mother, being a very strict woman, had slight patience with the child whose head was filled with fantasies, and who constantly dreamed of melodies to the neglect of her home duties. When the future prima donna was scolded and sometimes even more seriously punished for her inattention and neglect, her father would intercede, saying that the child would some day make her mark, and it was best to let her go her own road of development.

Christine Neilson all through her life has maintained a nobility of character, sweetness of temper, and tenderness of heart that is truly remarkable for one who has occupied the position she has. No amount of homage or ovation has ever been able to destroy her mental poise or to win her away from those lessons which were deeply impressed upon her mind in her home training. Through all her studies and hard work in her youth, and all through the years of her remarkable successes she has continued a habit of spending a certain amount of time in daily devotions. She herself attributes all her success to the religious beliefs which her godly father instilled in her as a child.

Many years ago at Ljungby, a gentleman, whose name ranked large in the world of music, heard Miss Neilson sing and offered to make arrangements for her to go to Halmstad to study under a well-known teacher. With that started the years of constant training that led finally to her artistic triumphs in many lands. It has been reported lately that the countess has been suffering from bronchitis and that this necessitates her spending several months in a warmer climate than her native Sweden. Other than this she is reported to be in good health, able to move about freely, to entertain, and sometimes even to favor her most intimate friends with little songs.

"That's just enough to make a nice bunch, you know. Enough for all the garden varieties of a good time. (Well, Mr. Butterinski, have it farm varieties if you will, but it's a rotten poor pun.) Enough to keep us from getting tired of one another, but not enough to split up into cliques or any of that sort of tomfoolery.

"You see the kind of stuff we grow. Just the ordinary garden-truck, tomatoes, lettuce, celery, potatoes; that sort of stuff. No fancy vegetables. We may get to that before we graduate, but just now the farm is a new thing, and we are learning how to look after the simple vegetables first. We are working full time now because it is the time to cultivate. Later, we shall put in less time, because college duties will take our attention. But we must find time to do the work thoroughly. You can see by the look of things here, if you are anything of a farmer, that there has been a lot of solid industry expended on this little section of the earth's much scarified face.

"Oh, dear, no!" continued the student farmer, in reply to a question put rather hesitatingly. "The other students do not look down upon us because we are working through. There's no snobbishness of that sort round these diggings. On the contrary, as I have said, there is a lot of competition to get the chance to work here, and although we are all simon-pure working students on the job now, we could have our places filled in a minute by fellows more fortunately situated if we would vacate and give them a chance. Whether they would stick to it as we have to, is a question. It isn't all pie forking fertilizer, working hand cultivators and fighting the merry parasite. But we are far from complaining. It will be a good thing to watch this little farm squad and see how we come out later in life. We're pretty fully convinced that this particular slice of experience isn't going to do us any harm. Just keep your eye on us! Watch us grow! A little of that manure here, Oscar.

"Going? Well, so long. Call again."

The action of the Secretary of the Interior is to maintain the status quo by refusing to revive the order which was revoked, and by retaining in the service those now engaged in teaching, although wearing a distinctive religious garb, but to declare his intention strictly to pursue the policy hereafter of maintaining only non-sectarian teaching by government teachers in government schools, and, on the other hand, to leave to the various denominations interested full opportunity out of regular school hours in the rooms of such government schools, to conduct religious education according to the customs and the tenets of each denomination for the children, who themselves or through their parents have elected to become members of such denomination. This solution, it seems to me, is very equitable as to existing conditions, is quite in accordance with the purpose of Congress, and ought to satisfy all persons in interest of the purpose of the Interior Department to do equity and at the same time to carry out the congressional intent.

The action of the Secretary of the Interior is, therefore, approved.

IN HIMALAYAN BYWAYS

ANOTHER report of adventure, toil, and conquest comes from the Tehri Border Village Mission among the Himalaya Mountains where Rev. William Greet and his wife are carrying the Gospel message to the people of the hill country.

"The past season's touring," writes Mr. Greet, "totaled up more than that of any previous season, and included reaching into some new country. One of my first trips away from our family camp, after the writing of our last letter, was to see poor old Prema at Nauta. There he sat by the little water-mill, blind and very helpless, trying to care for the people's flour. In the judgment of some who have lately seen for him, he seems a believer.

"We returned to our home in January for a few weeks and then went out again to stay till April. This time we pushed forward at once to Devasari, a neighborhood of many villages which last season we were prevented from reaching. We pitched our camp on the edge of a pine wood and close to a small ravine, on the other side of which lay a long line of villages. Close by our tent was the temple to which, on special occasions, the people gathered from all sides.

"My memory goes back many years to some remarkable results from the very first visits to simple villagers in the plains who accepted Christ at once and stood faithful till death, but generally where people are laid hold of, it is after continued presentations of the truth. A most encouraging thing during our touring in the hills this past springtime was the extent to which the truth of the Gospel was admitted by a man who has served us for years but had always passively resisted all we said. He sat with me at the close of a hot journey up a long gorge to a village where we found only one man, a lad and a child at home. We conversed, under the shade of an apricot tree, concerning the Way of Life and other ways, and at the close our man, who has nearly always boasted of the superiority of his own religion, said to the village man, 'We shall have to come to it! this religion will win its way everywhere and all will at some time have to yield, willingly or unwillingly.'

"As I write part of this letter here on the roadside, half a dozen fakirs or sadhus sit down with me to listen to the singing of a bhajan which tells of the One who can take away sin. They have been to the Ganges source away in the snows, professedly to be rid of their sin. Some Sirmoori charcoal men come in the other direction and they too sit down to listen. Neither of these groups are Tehri men, so I sing to them in Hindi. Presently some others come, Tehri men to whom I read the Lord's words about the house on a rock and that on the sand. One man wishes to buy a Gospel but has no coppers with him, so he consents to pay for a book with his stick, which answers very well as a walking-stick for me.

"After presenting many various arguments in trying to convince the people of the truths of our eternal Gospel we drop back again to the proof they can have in their own heart at this very time in their own village, if they will really give themselves up in prayer to him who was revealed to take away sin. After talking with us the people find themselves, perhaps the same day, in the midst of, say, the slaughter of goats throughout the village for the keeping up of some special festival, or a great dance before their gods right on into the night. Who knows where the Message has really found access?"

ANSWERED PRAYERS

"A Very Present Help"

IF PHOTOGRAPHS of all the people who send statements of Answered Prayer to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD could be collected, what a gallery of faces would be shown! If illustrations could be made of the household groups and scenes referred to in the letters, what a picture-book of human life would be produced! Many letters tell of dear mothers restored to life and health. It is easy to picture those scenes: the members of the household, tiptoeing about; the hurried whispers in the hall; the tearful, brave folks who must stay in the kitchen and get the meals for the others; the anxious waiting for the doctor's morning call. And up in the sick-room a dear, silvered head lies upon the pillow; hot, weak hands lie outside the coverlet, hands that have been busy enough in other days; the fevered, worn body is very still; a nurse, or a kindly neighbor, watches the fitful sleeping and the patient wakings to fresh bewilderment and pain. And perhaps it is father, out in the haymow, or alone in the strange guest-room whither he has been banished when mother grew so ill, who, on his knees, is asking God to spare for a little while the old sweetheart of his youth, the brave comrade of the long, long years. Or perhaps it is the daughter, who runs up from the kitchen, and, stealing into her own room, asks God to let mother stay a few years more in the old, dear home. Then suddenly there is a change. The fever lessens; the pain is stilled. The doctor looks surprised and pleased. The dear mother-face lights up with the old smile. Sunshine filters through the vines and fills the house. The birds are found to be singing; if they had been singing an hour ago no one heard. Father knows what has happened; daughter knows. In their hearts the words are repeating themselves: "He touched her hand and the fever left her."

That afternoon a letter is written to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that reads like this: "Praise God for answering my prayer in sparing the life of my precious mother"; or this: "I praise God for answering our prayer and sparing our dear mother to us"; or this: "I wish to acknowledge that the dear Lord restored my mother to health through prayer." These letters come from a reader, New York City; G. A. P., North Bangor, N. Y.; and E. M. B., Watsontown, Pa.

There are still other letters which tell of mothers restored to their homes in answer to prayer. Then there is the other picture: "I wish to thank God for sparing the life of our baby when she was very low. The physicians said she could not possibly live, but through prayer she has recovered." This letter comes from Mrs. C. A. R., of Kings Mountain, N. C., and a similar letter is received from Mrs. C. S. F., of Louisville, Ky. Mrs. M. L. R. writes from Red Oak, Ia.: "I sought God with all my heart to save my baby's life, which he did." V. H. writes from West Virginia: "I wish to acknowledge that our daughter's life was spared in answer to earnest prayer." Mrs. J. G. of Omaha, Neb., says: "In answer to prayer my son is well." C. H. S., of Hinton, W. Va., writes: "I prayed that my brother would get well. The Lord heard and answered my prayer." C. W. writes: "I believe that God brought my father through a very serious illness in answer to our prayers."

The letters tell of other kinds of trouble that have been conquered by prayer. Mrs. S. W. writes, from Naches, Wash.: "I wish to bear witness to answered prayers for employment, when in need." J. P., of Greenfield, O., says: "God does answer prayer. Not long since our home seemed to be gone; I asked God to give it back and he did." A. K. N., of Mt. Holly, N. J., writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness and mercy in hearing and answering my prayer in a time of great financial distress, and thereby increasing my faith and trust in his promises."

A. B., of Washington, D. C., wants to "tell the world, through our blessed paper, how many times God has heard and answered the prayers of an Old Widow." "A South Dakota Girl" writes: "I want to acknowledge that God has been good to me in answering my prayers." There is a pleasant sound to the letter from E. F. D., Staten Island; it seems to indicate that God is really very friendly: "I wish to acknowledge my gratitude to God for a beautiful answer to prayer."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from: A Reader, Hickory, N. C.; Mr. and Mrs. N., Brooklyn, N. Y.; Mrs. E. H., Conrad, Ill.; Eliza, Pennsylvania; W. G. M., St. Andrews, Fla.; G. W. H., Bloomsburg, Pa.; C. L. A., Sidney, Neb.; G. T. B., New Bedford, Mass.; R. W. C., Uniontown, Ky.; A Constant Reader, Gallatin, Tenn.; Mrs. F. B., Holdenville, Okla.; A. B. M., Newark Valley, N. Y.; L., St. Clairsville, O.; J. L. P., Konorado, Kan.; C. E. H., Franklin, Pa., and M. J. K., Middletown, N. Y.

Mine Host of "The Golden Apple"

A goodly host one day was mine,
A Golden Apple his only sign,
That hung from a long branch, ripe and fine.

My host was the bountiful apple tree;
He gave me shelter and nourished me
With the best of fare, all fresh and free.

And light-winged guests came not a few,
To his leafy inn, and sipped the dew,
And sang their best songs ere they flew.

I went to sleep on a downy bed
Of moss, and my host benignly spread
His own cool shadow over my head.

When I asked what reckoning there might be,
He shook his broad boughs cheerily:
A blessing on the sweet Apple Tree!

THOMAS WESTWOOD.

Of course no cook could make anything finer. The "beauty of it" is that women who cannot cook can make as good desserts as the best cook, for doesn't have to be cooked. The young housekeeper who must prepare the meals herself and uses Jell-O, is saved much experimenting at the expense of her husband's digestion and good nature.

JELL-O

She is always sure of a good dessert for him anyway.

In purity and wholesomeness Jell-O is as near perfection as science and skill can make it, and nothing else so surely hits the spot in the appetite that is pleading to be hit.

There are seven Jell-O flavors: Strawberry, Raspberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Peach, Chocolate.

Questions and Answers

G. B., Dayton, O. How is life of any kind possible at great ocean depths?

Two factors render life possible in the greater depths of the sea. The constant currents descending from the surface in the polar regions to the bottom and thence to the equatorial regions bring with them the necessary oxygen, although the amount of this gas present in the great depths is much less than at the surface. The other factor, that of food, is, in the last analysis, furnished by the constant death of surface (pelagic) forms whose dead bodies, slowly sinking through the water, furnish the nourishment needed by the abyssal creatures which in turn are preyed upon by those more highly organized.

P. R., Ferndale, N. Y. 1. The name or identity of Cain's wife need trouble no one; she was probably of his own kindred, as the human family at that time had evidently grown in numbers, as may be gathered from Gen. 4: 14, 15. The land of Nod simply means "land of exile." Any one who would refuse to believe the Scriptures on account of this particular question, must be very easily dissuaded. 2. The use of tobacco is unquestionably a vice, although it has its apologists. Those Bible class teachers and others who approve it should be pointed to I. Thess. 5: 22, which lays down the proper rule of conduct in such a case. If this is not sufficient, you may also ask them to read Matt. 5: 29, 30, Luke 17: 2 and I. Cor. 8: 13. It is our duty to be an example to others, and the influence of personal example is one of the strongest points in Christian character.

Reader, Imlay City, Mich. We read in the Bible that "Whosoever will, may come," and "Him that cometh I will in no wise cast out." Does that invitation extend to one who, while professing Christ and being a member of the church, has lived a life out of all harmony with that profession; who has neglected obvious duties and carelessly at least and sometimes wilfully stifled the voice of conscience, and who during a period of revival service has been allowed to see where he stands and longs to get right with God? Is there any hope for such a sinner, in your opinion, and what must he do to be saved?

There is but one simple course to follow: He should renew his profession, confess Christ as Saviour before men, and, asking forgiveness, endeavor, with all the strength of his will and with divine help, to begin a new life. A backslider is not irredeemable although he may have wandered far from the Cross and even stifled the voice of conscience. But he must be willing to lay down his pride and stubbornness, and to come in all meekness and sincerity once more to the fount of pardon and blessing. Above all, he should pray to be kept again from falling into sin and indifference. We would advise such a one to take an active part in the spiritual activities of his church. There is nothing so effective as to keep busy working for Christ and for the good of our fellow men.

W. W. D., Norristown, Pa. The passage in Matt. 23d chapter, to which you refer, is a part of Jesus' denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees, who were given over to formalism and regarded the letter rather than the spirit of Scripture. They sought personal honors and the applause of the multitudes. They carried strips of parchment of Scripture texts, bound to arm, forehead and side, in time of prayer, and they loved to be addressed by ecclesiastical titles. Rabbi (Master) was a title which they particularly affected and which their whole spiritual conduct discredited. Had they been true teachers and guides, instead of false, he would not have reprobated them, nor would they have belied the title they bore. Titles in the modern Christian Church are vain distinctions, except where they are worthily worn. All should be brethren in Christ, the highest dignitary of the church and the humblest follower. Unfortunately, in every age there has been a desire for ecclesiastical distinctions and, while in many cases these have been merited and gladly accorded, in others the honors were not deserved. The ecclesiastical system of the Jews lent itself to this vanity to such an extent as to arouse the divine indignation. The title "Rab" was originally Babylonian and that of "Rabbi," Palestinian. It was given to learned men, authorized teachers of the law and spiritual heads of the community.

A. J. B., Shamokin, Pa. Do you consider it advisable to use a prayer-book for family worship or private devotions?

There are many who use prayer-books. They are a guide to devotion and an aid to those who have not the gift of freely expressing their emotions in words, or who suffer from self-consciousness when praying aloud before others. We have frequently seen very worthy Christian people at prayer-meeting, laboring in distress when asked to lead in prayer. In many of our churches, too, of various denominations, the prayer-book is called into service, and they are very appropriately used for certain functions and observances in practically all the churches. But after all, they are merely designed to be an aid to the expression of the feelings of the heart and not to supersede voluntary prayer. For family worship you may use a prayer-book as our good forefathers did in the olden days or you may read a portion of Scripture, and then repeat the Lord's Prayer in unison; then let each in turn or one leader for all, follow in simple petitions which meet the needs of that household. One does not need to be eloquent, or learned, or oratorical to pray. Speak to God reverently in your own simple way, fearing nothing, but believing, for he will never turn a deaf ear to those who come to him in the right spirit.

Mr. H. P. Main, the well-known Gospel hymn writer and composer, writes: "The versification of the Lord's Prayer, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for September 25, page 942, was made by Rev. Adoniram Judson in March, 1825, while a prisoner at Ava, in Burma. It is said to be comprised in fewer words than the original Greek and in two more words only than the common translation. I believe the original varies from the version given in your paper only in stanzas one and three. Stanza one, line four:

"In earth and heaven the same.

"In stanza three, lines three and four:

"The kingdom, power, and glory, Lord,
Ever belong to thee.

The hymn has been used in many books for Sunday schools, and I think in some of the Baptist and other hymnals."

Reader, Hastings, Mich. The "one thing needful" to carry out your purpose is to get under the banner of Christ. Join the church, make open profession and acceptance of your faith, and profit by contact with Christian people. The church to-day has many activities in which you ought to have a personal share. Find something to do, however simple. Religion does not consist in prayers and introspection; it consists in living the Christian life, having faith in God and carrying it into your daily duties. Ask your own heart in every emergency, "What would Jesus do?" and, as far as lies in your power, follow his example in being pure, truthful, honest and kind. Ask him to help you and keep you day by day.

N. S. D., Pennsylvania. Please explain Matt. 5: 19.

The meaning of the passage is: Whosoever shall break, or make invalid through deliberate misinterpretation, one of the least of these commandments and shall teach men so (as the Pharisees were doing), shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven. The penalty was not exclusion from heaven, but the loss of the position of honor in God's kingdom, which they might have enjoyed. On the other hand, whosoever shall teach men to obey the law in its right interpretation, looking to the glory and honor of God, should be honored in heaven. It was a warning to the Scribes and Pharisees that righteousness must be inward, vital and spiritual, instead of outward and formal.

A. L. B., Bloomington, Ill. Can consumption be cured? Is it hereditary? If not, how is it communicated? Is it a fact it kills more than any other disease? Who called it the Great White Plague?

Consumption, unless too far advanced, can be practically cured by nature's process of confining the tubercular germs in sacs of fibrous tissue, which later become calcified, and thus prevent the spread of the disease. Formerly it was thought to be hereditary, but the great German bacteriologist, Robert Koch, isolated the bacillus in 1880-2. In most cases consumption is communicated by the dried-up sputum of victims, which as particles of dust may be whirled through the streets and light anywhere; the most dangerous localities are congested tenement districts and some factories and mills, where sanitation is defective and sunlight and good air lacking. With the possible exception of pneumonia, consumption causes the greatest destruction to humanity, the annual toll of deaths in this country alone amounting to almost 150,000. Tuberculosis (including consumption) was called the Great White Plague by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes.

C. W. P., Boston, Mass., apropos of a recent paragraph in THE MAIL-BAG, "The whole influence of the Boy Scout movement is against militarism and military drill, as not only having a tendency toward war, but also toward creating a mere unit in a machine, whereas the purpose of the Scouts is to inspire originality and initiative in the individual."

Jesus had said many things to and about his disciples before his death, which indicated that they were converted men: "Rejoice, because your names are written in heaven," Luke 10: 20; "Now ye are clean through the word that I have spoken unto you," John 15: 3; "Ye know him" (the Spirit of truth), "for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." IT'S THE FOOD

The True Way to Correct Nervous Trou

Nervous troubles are more often ca by improper food and indigestion most people imagine. Even doctors s times overlook this fact. A man say

"Until two years ago waffles and b with meat and gravy were the main ures of my breakfast. Finally dyspe came on and I found myself in a bad dition, worse in the morning than other time. I would have a full, sick ing in my stomach, with pains in heart, sides and head.

"At times I would have no appetite days, then I would feel ravenous, n satisfied when I did eat and so nervc felt like shrieking at the top of my v I lost flesh badly and hardly knew w way to turn until one day I bought a of Grape-Nuts food to see if I coulc that. I tried it without telling the do and liked it fine; made me feel as had something to eat that was satisf and still I didn't have that heavi that I had felt after eating any o food.

"I hadn't drank any coffee then in weeks. I kept on with the Grape-N and in a month and a half I had ga fifteen pounds, could eat almost anyt I wanted, didn't feel badly after ea and my nervousness was all gone. I pleasure to be well again."

verse he distinguishes them from "the world." The world, he said, cannot receive the Spirit; but the Spirit was already with the disciples, and was to come into their hearts in greater fulness, as he did on the day of Pentecost. In the high priestly prayer Jesus said: "I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me; for they are thine;" "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world;" "Thine they were, and thou gavest them me; and they have kept thy word," John 17: 9, 14, 16, 6. Although Peter was a converted man, he fell into sin and denied his Master. It is the common experience of justified Christians that, while they do not habitually sin, they slip occasionally into transgression. But after the fulness of the Spirit had been received on the day of Pentecost, Peter and the other apostles stood firm. This also has been the experience of many Christians since the apostles' time, who have found, in a second blessing, sanctifying and keeping grace. Jacob's experience was the same. Before his blessing at Jabbok, he had met God at Bethel and received the promise: "I will not leave thee," Gen. 28: 15; God had spoken to him again, while he dwelt with Laban, Gen. 31: 3-11; the angels of God met him at Mahanaim, Gen. 32: 2. But after the experience at Jabbok, or Peniel, he lived to the end of his days a purer, higher spiritual life.

S. B. M., Leavenworth, Kan. After life becomes extinct, can the body be called really dead, when, as science teaches, its constituents pass into other forms?

When life ceases, the body as an individual organization is said to be dead; that is to say, death is the cessation of organic life. Matter, however, is indestructible; when it loses one form it appears in another. The matter of which the body is composed does not perish on the death of an organized being; it undergoes various changes which are known by the names of decay and putrefaction and which are the preparation for its becoming subservient to new forms of life. What becomes of the mind or thinking principle in man, otherwise the soul, is altogether a matter of religious faith or philosophic conjecture on which science has been unable to throw the slightest light. God has revealed the truth in the Bible, and particularly in the historic fact of Christ's resurrection, that the soul which is in harmony with himself will live forever. For the Scripture teaching concerning the resurrection of the body read I. Cor. 15, which has been recognized from the earliest Christian times as the expression of the Christian's faith about the future life. Note particularly verses 35-44, 50-54.

W. M., Holland, Mich. The attitude of the Christian Church, or a very considerable portion of it, toward Socialism is undergoing a change. The church is coming more and more to recognize the fact that the claims of Socialism are not to be turned aside. It is also beginning to understand that there are two kinds of Socialism: 1. Constructive or beneficent, which aims at the amelioration of existing conditions and the uplifting of the masses through the pacific methods of education, agitation and legislation, and 2, destructive Socialism, which is antagonistic to law and order. There are many excellent books published.

P. M. S., Louisville, Ky. Do animals reason?

Animals do not reason as men; they do not profit by the experience of actions to varying circumstances. Spencer defined reason as "the faculty which is concerned in the intentional adaptation of means to an end." This faculty is lacking in animals. For instance, a monkey will sit by a fire of logs the hunter has kindled, but when the blaze dies down to embers and the cold asserts its influence, it will never occur to the monkey to throw on more logs to restore the heat. It is safe to assume, however, that the higher animals, especially those which have been in contact with and trained by man, exhibit the germs of reason, and while they cannot make inductions and deductions or predictions, their intellectual acts differ rather in degree than in kind from those of the lowest races.

H. R. W., Long Island, N. Y., writes: "I felt it my duty to communicate with you in reference to the argument advanced by one D. R. E. of North Lewisburg, O., and answered so ably and correctly by you. It is regrettable but nevertheless true that some of our Protestant brethren cannot be induced to believe that the Church of Rome is bending every effort to make America Catholic. If these same ones could only have a vision of the result should the Church of Rome succeed in her purpose, then how quickly they would change their minds and say with James Madison, when he was President of the United States: "It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment upon our liberties, and to hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens." I for one wish to commend you for giving publicity to the aims and purposes of the Roman hierarchy, and I sincerely hope that your readers will take full note of the warnings and be governed by them. We do not want history to repeat itself here in the United States, which will certainly happen if our non-Catholic citizens are not on the alert, regardless of what their opinions are of their Catholic friends who really do not know what their church is planning to accomplish."

R. F. B., Chicopee, Mass. Give the composition of the present Congress as to political affiliation.

In the present or Sixty-second Congress, there are in the Senate 51 Republicans, 39 Democrats and five Independents, while in the House there are 228 Republicans, 162 Democrats and one Independent, who is a Socialist.

Reader, New London, Ia. 1. Explain Heb. 4: 8. 2. Explain Eph. 4: 5. Did Christ establish any creed? Since the apostles were all taught the same thing why do we have different creeds?

1. The word Jesus here should be Joshua. Joshua, though he led the people into Canaan, did not really lead them into spiritual rest. This is precisely what Jesus does. The soul that is really trusting him, trusting the power of his sacrifice to save from the penalty of laws broken in the past, and trusting to his power to keep from sin in the present, is living a restful life. 2. It is true that there is only "one faith." But Jesus did not go into minute details in instructing his apostles, preferring to teach great principles. In determining the details of worship and conduct, or in interpreting the directions he gave, his followers have sometimes differed from one another. It is these differences that have made the different denominations. But all the evangelical denominations agree in this: that men are saved by faith in Jesus Christ.

R. B. S., Bethlehem, Pa. When did the Jewish calendar originate, and what is the present Jewish year?

In the fifteenth century the Jews adopted as their epoch the Creation of the World, which was placed on a year called in the Christian chronology 3760 B.C. This makes the present year, 1912, correspond to the year of the world 5672-5673 in the Jewish calendar.

Miscellaneous

Constant Reader, Victoria, Can. There is no passage in the Bible which can be so construed.

Mrs. L. E. F., Zionsville, Pa. One should vote as conscience directs for the best moral interests of the community.

G. H. R., Shiremanstown, Pa. There is nothing in Scripture to justify any church or denomination in compelling members to adopt a certain dress nor justifying the deprivation of church privileges for refusing to conform to such a rule.

R. N. A., Asbury Park, N. J. There are already observed in many churches now the anniversary of Founders' Day (Puritan) and Forefathers' Day (Pilgrims), although the observance is not national.

J. H. F., Covington, Ky. We quite agree with you that no one has a right to speak decisively on matters that are largely speculative, and concerning which there is a marked division of opinion even among the ablest commentators. We quoted these in the article in question, and gave the Scripture passages bearing on the subject.

M. E. J., East Boston, Mass. Read I. Cor., 15th chapter, for a statement of the belief of the early Christian Church concerning the resurrection. This is accepted as the general belief of the church to-day. See verse 50. The passage in Job 19: 26, which is so frequently quoted, is transformed by the more accurate rendering of the Revised Version to read "out of my flesh."

J. C., Oxford, O. The book of Job is believed to be a spiritual allegory. The name Job is derived from an Arabic word signifying "repentance." Not a few writers, however, refer to Job himself as a real personage. (See Ezek. 14: 14 and James 5: 11.) The book is in the nature of a public debate in poetic form on an important question concerning divine government, viz.: Are the righteous afflicted consistently with God's justice? Satan is here the accusing angel, who is permitted to test Job. We must read the book as an allegory and allow for the many things which would not appear in an ordinary narrative of events.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

distant Capernaum; and to those who are told about its existence, but cannot go to see it for themselves.

Ever since the days of the Samaritan woman and the Syrophenician woman, and the Roman centurion, God has been raising up men and women as leaders of the Spirit in many lands: Saul of Tarsus was the great preacher to the Gentiles in his native Asia, and in Europe beyond.

Africaner, called "the monster" and "the human tiger" because of his savage cruelty, and for whose head a hundred pounds ($500) had been offered by the governor of Cape Town, through the grace of God became a Christian and a preacher of righteousness to his people in Africa.

Joseph Neesima embraced Christianity in his early youth, and afterwards established the Doshisha, the great Christian college in which hundreds of the youths of Japan have received a Christian education.

Dr. J. R. Brown, a missionary of more than forty years' experience in Turkey, tells of a boy named Thomas, who was literally forced upon his care by a widowed mother when he was preaching in a small town that he had crossed a swollen river to reach, at great risk of his life. Almost reluctantly he took the boy back with him, and the outcome has been that the boy, grown to manhood, has become the religious leader and reformer of Kurdistan, the wise counselor of his people in personal and national affairs.

Almost every missionary could give similar instances of God's raising up men and women to be his messengers. Such a woman was Frances E. Willard. There is hardly a land in the world where her name is not spoken, and where her picture is not seen, and where her teachings are not followed. We have met her thus in Australia and Iceland and in all the lands that lie between. Once when crossing the ocean, bound for Liverpool, she was told that just ahead lay the rocks called "Bull, Cow, and Calf." The captain said: "If my calculations are right, we shall see them in ten minutes." He had made the statement by what is called "dead reckoning," taken in a dense fog, which had dimmed the sun and stars for two days or more. In five minutes the outlook reported, and in eight minutes the "Bull, Cow, and Calf" were reported. Miss Willard enlarges upon the incident thus: "A good sailor, loyal and true, sings his song of cheer, and in light or darkness keeps at his post, and reckons himself right, and goes on his way rejoicing. God's Book is the Christian's chart; the star of Bethlehem his polar star; the Sun of righteousness illumines his heavens; the compass of faith guides sure and true, whether he sees the light above or not, and he sails on, singing:

"Blest be the sorrow, kind the storm,
That drives me nearer home."

It is perhaps not known that astronomers depend almost wholly upon stars for obtaining accurate time. They can rely upon them because there are several hundred stars whose positions have been noted at the principal observatories of the world, and the data concerning them, including the time when they will pass the meridian of any given place, is published in nautical almanacs for the use of navigators and all others who have uses for them. These stars are called "clock stars." Each Christian, whether his sphere be large or small, should be like a clock star in morals, in all noble deeds, and in Christian conduct and leadership.

Jesus said to the Syrophenician woman, "Great is thy faith; be it done unto thee as thou wilt." And of the centurion he said: "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." We are reminded of the "water test" given to diamonds; by means of it, even the most inexperienced person can discover whether or not a stone is genuine; the real diamond will become all the more brilliant by being placed under water, while the imitation stone will lose its luster. And so the faith of the true Christian will become more apparent when he is surrounded by the deep waters of sorrow. It is then that the true servants of God, like Job, shine forth as genuine jewels of the King.

Have you faith great enough to make this your daily prayer?

These are the gifts I ask
Of Thee, Spirit serene:
Strength for the daily task,
Courage to face the road,
Good cheer to help me bear the traveler's load,
And for the hours of rest that come between,
An inward joy in all things heard and seen.
These are the sins I would have thee take away:
Malice and cold disdain,
Hot anger, sullen hate,
Scorn of the lowly, envy of the great,
And discontent that casts a shadow gray
On all the brightness of a common day.

HENRY VAN DYKE.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—TO SPREAD far and near the "glad tidings of great joy" is the purpose of the Good News Association of the United Brethren Church. One band of five bearers of good news is now in the field, and it is the purpose of the United Brethren Church to put other bands in the field during the fall and winter. A Good News band consists of a leader, a good singer, a worker with and for children, a pianist and a secretary. This band of workers stands ready to go wherever their services are in request.

—IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for August 21 the statistics given for the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene were taken from a table compiled before the reports of the denomination's latest addition had been received. The correct figures are as follows: 470 churches; 20,501 communicants; 545 ordained ministers; 570 local preachers and exhorters; 17,978 Sunday school pupils. The Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene is almost the newest denomination, but its growth has been phenomenally rapid.

—THE SEAMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION has for more than a quarter of a century extended help to sailors at New York. It provides a free shipping employment bureau, where over one thousand men a month are shipped free of charge. It sends destitute and shipwrecked seamen to their homes, visits and cares for sailors who are patients in hospitals. Its Gospel services are attended by an average of sixty men, and hundreds visit its rooms to read and write letters. Concerts are given each week, with a large attendance. Libraries are placed on ships and comfort bags, knitted articles, etc., are given to worthy and needy seamen.

—THE HEARTSEASE WORK for Friendless Women in New York has entered its fourteenth year. 204 women and 52 babies have been cared for; 14,459 meals given; 5,305 lodgings; 1,290 garments given; 1,184 visits made and 10 children adopted. It endeavors to show these friendless women the way of salvation, and to elevate them by instilling into their hearts and minds the principles of right living, using God's Word as a text-book; to teach them the customs of decent society and to train them to be self-supporting. To this end instruction is given in Bible, English, stenography, sewing and domestic science. Some of these women walk the streets all day, seeking shelter. The greatest need of the work at present is a place for mothers and babies who are convalescing, seeking employment or homeless; and a nursery properly equipped for the little strangers who are waiting for a home.

—MISS C. E. MASON, president of the International Council for Patriotic Service, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "The Mormons are now having a moving picture made to show the growth of their sect in the last hundred years. It is to be most favorable to them. They plan to use this film in educating the masses all over the United States, Mexico, Central and South America, Europe, Asia and Africa, and they are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on it. It is time to be up and doing before this 'educational' film is to be released in October or the latter part of September."

—THE RESULTS of the great revival which took place in Wichita, Kan., about six months ago are still being widely felt in the country round about that city. Each Sunday a group of business men who call themselves Wichita's Forward Movement Team visit some of the smaller towns and hold evangelistic services. A few weeks ago, one of these services held in Oxford, a town of six hundred people in southern Kansas, was attended by the greatest success. Twelve members of the team were present and as they are all of them business men, farmers or professional men, their method of carrying the Gospel message is particularly adapted to the type of work they have chosen for themselves.

—W. A. EASTMAN, A CONVERTED ex-criminal, who for two years past has been doing Christian work in California, Oregon and Washington, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD inquiring: "Is there any company or society that would let me have little New Testaments to distribute as I go along?" He has been speaking on the streets and in churches and has become acquainted with over thirty ministers since beginning his Gospel work two years ago. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is forwarding several Testaments to him. Perhaps some of our readers may be disposed to assist this "brand plucked from the burning" in his new field.

—THE FORWARD MOVEMENT, a settlement founded in 1893 in Chicago, Ill., started its Forward Movement Park fourteen years ago. During the past fourteen years they have taken 11,282 people from the congested district of Chicago to their summer park at Saugatuck, Mich. Some of these people paid a small part of their expenses, others paid all of their expenses, and a great many paid nothing other than a small fee for expenses. The park itself is 133 acres of Michigan land with a large beach and a river a quarter of a mile away. This land, buildings and equipment, including an up-to-date electric light plant, water works and sewer system, is worth over $125,000. The attendance last year was 986, and this year promises to run above that mark. The park is open six months in the year. The activities of the people are those of a social, physical, educational and religious nature as the work carried on elsewhere.

—RECENTLY RESIDENTS of the Flatbush section of Brooklyn saw a practical demonstration of real church work and interest. The men of the Lutheran Church of the Good Shepherd turned out one morning with overalls, paint-pots, brushes and ladders to paint their church. The church was begun only shortly ago, and its resources were strained to meet the heavy expenses on its property. The pastor, Dr. Pannkoke, saw the need of a new coat of paint, but also knew the difficulty of obtaining the necessary funds at the time to pay a professional painter. He suggested that the men themselves get out and do the work. Enthusiasm grew apace, and the plan was decided upon. Then the pastor broached another idea. Not every one has the privilege to paint a church. Why not charge for the privilege? A fee of one dollar was decided upon for every one desirous of undertaking to paint. One coat was finished the first week, and the second the week after. And at present the church is one of the coziest and prettiest of Flatbush. Not only has the painting been done in record time, and well done, but the interest of the men, who thus showed their enthusiasm, has been more than doubled, and is ready to do more in other lines of church work.

CHINESE NOBLEMAN AT HOME

not include his grandsons, who od in attitudes of loving and admir- respect.) As soon as we had been ved with fresh tea and had tried a en or so of the comforts prepared our delectation, we began a con- sation as to the most recent famine, means taken to relieve the worthy fering and the generous contribu- s from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S ders.

"I want you to see my home," Lord continued, "for this is my real ne, though I have a house in Shang- and a summer bungalow at Kiu- g. Here my ancestors lived; here I s born and here my children and irs came into the world. This place the growth of hundreds of years, I am sure there are not many, in ina or elsewhere, that have more, or re sacred, associations. I shall live e and, if possible, die here; from e I shall be buried, and within these lls my descendants shall venerate memory, as I have revered that of ancestors and theirs."

All this was said in simplest fashion I listened to by grandsons and serv- s with bowed heads.

The walls enclose several acres—t how many I cannot tell exactly, ause Chinese units of measurement vastly different from ours. With- the compass of the inner enclosure re are ten lakes, connected with h other by miniature ravines, made bronze and decorated, as are the nks, with every conceivable variety flower, vine, shrub and dwarfed e. Pointing to one of the latter, I d: "Ah! a Japanese cedar!" "Not " came the quick reply; "a Chinese duct. Japan learned from us to arf and pattern trees and shrubs; rned as she did many other matters use and ornament."

Our tour was ended by an inspec- n, under Lord Ho's personal super- ion, of the rooms devoted to curios d antiques. Of these rooms and gal- ies there were at least a dozen, and lespair of giving even a hint of the riety and scope of the "museum ces" displayed. There were authen- ated bronzes dating from the Han nasty, B.C. 2200; coins of a lineage at makes the Cæsars seem "new h"; evolutions in ivory showing how e ideas of idol-makers grew in gro- squery; great variegated marbles om Yunnan or the gorges of the ngtse, whose veins had been guided into pictures of mountains, trees, pagodas and bridges.

There were jewels, cut and uncut; rosaries that had decked the necks of great Buddhas in far-off temples, long since gone to ruin; porcelains so light and transparent, so cunningly simulative of bird or butterfly, that one could imagine them alive and floating. The curios are Lord Ho's delight.

Of servants in this wonderhouse I learned there are more than 800 when the family is in residence and half as many the year around. A venerable footman or body servant joined us in one of the curio-hung corridors and entered into a whispered conversation with one of the grandsons, who looked much pleased as he dismissed the servant and said: "My grandmother wishes you to visit her in her own apartments."

My missionary friend fairly gasped, so unusual was this mark of favor. We repaired at once to the more secluded portions of this labyrinthine home and were ushered into a large living room very simply though prettily furnished in Chinese fashion, with fragrant matting on the floor, cabinets of rare china lining the walls, several chairs, including two American rockers, and numerous screens. From behind one of the latter soon came a dainty gentlewoman of seventy or more, supported, because of her impossibly small feet, by two female servants, and smiling adorably with black eyes, carmined lips and artistically decorated cheeks. Black satin that could "stand alone," as the old-time storywriters were wont to put it, clothed Lady Ho from neck to ankle.

The interview was short, and consisted mainly of reciprocal compliments; but I shall not soon forget the picture nor the glimpse of a life so foreign to all our Western ideas. Lady Ho, I learned, is a power in the household and a very dictator as to the education, pursuits and amusements of her grandchildren.

After tiffin, a ride was proposed—a ride on horseback or in sedan chairs, as we elected—and some of the marvelous shops of the ancient city were visited. Returning, we saw the library where the family spend hours each day and where newspapers in Chinese, English and French are displayed in a plenitude not to be excelled in the home of any European or American millionaire.

"TIFFIN"

)N THE rugged coast a storm had raged all night. As morning broke, e gale still kept up, and the vil- gers began their daily tasks in fear d trembling. Suddenly the boom of cannon was heard, and everybody stened to the beach, for they knew was a signal of distress. Far out on the tossing waves they saw intly the masts of a vessel, seem- gly beating itself to pieces upon the cks. The lifeboat crew quickly thered, but their captain, Tiffin, as not to be found. They manned e boat, however, pushed her out, d the sturdy rowers were soon lost view. A half hour passed before e anxious watchers on the shore re rewarded by seeing the boat re- rn. As the people gathered about e rescued and the rescuers, some e asked, "Did you get them all?" We've got all except one," was the swer. "That poor fellow was frozen the mast. Our boat was in danger d so we left him." Just then a big ilor stepped forward and said: Well, he is worth saving; we will go ter him." It was "Tiffin," the cap- in. His aged mother, with tears reaming down her face, said to her y: "O Harry, don't go out there is time. This is the anniversary of ur father's death. He died on just such a day. Your brother John left home eight years ago to be a sailor. We haven't heard from him since, and doubtless he too has been lost at sea. You're my only comfort, lad. Stay with me!"

"Tiffin" put his great strong hand upon her frail shoulders and looked down upon her care-worn face. "Mother," he said, "it's my duty to go out there. If I'm lost, God will take care of you." He kissed her, ordered his men to the boat, and it was again pushed out. Half an hour went by, three-quarters of an hour, and still no sign of her return. At last her faint outline was seen through mist and rain. It gradually grew larger, and soon it became evident to the spectators that its crew were fighting for life with the storm. Those on shore could see one man standing up in the prow, and finally made out the figure of the big captain. Then, as the boat came nearer and within hailing distance, they shouted out: "Did you get him?" They could see "Tiffin" reach over the prow and put his hands to his mouth so that his voice would carry, and then he shouted back this message:

"We got him, and tell mother it was brother John." EARLE W. GAGE.

MOONLIGHT

—IF YOU ARE A LOVER OF MUSIC

—then this advertisement and special free offer are meant for you. They open to you the opportunity to get for your music room, absolutely free of charge and without obligation of any sort, one of the most delightful little Art Volumes about music and musicians that you ever opened. Simply get out your shears and clip off the coupon at the foot of this page. Then fill it out and mail it.

That's all.

It will bring to you—with no other expense than the stamp on your envelope—an eighty-page volume, which you will find to be as interesting and valuable a musical work as you ever thumbed through. The book is one which we have gone to considerable expense to prepare, in order to make possible a really adequate description of the University Extension Correspondence Methods that are now used so successfully by many of the most eminent music teachers of the country in giving music lessons. These methods enable mothers to learn how to teach their children; young women to prepare to teach; established teachers to increase their efficiency and earn a teacher's certificate and the degree of Bachelor of Music; married men and women to revive their interest in music for its cultural value as well as its practical utility—pianists, organists, vocalists, violinists, cornetists and others—all in their spare time at home—thus making it no longer necessary for one who wants to study music under the masters to leave home, but bringing the best teaching within the reach of all, both in cost and convenience.

This book, which we offer to send free and which was designed primarily to describe this successful work, has developed into such a complete and useful volume in itself that we want every serious-minded and ambitious lover of music among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to possess a copy.

Of course, it is devoted largely to describing how it is possible for students to receive in the quiet of their own homes, for instance, the Piano Lessons of the great Sherwood; teachers of students' courses; the Harmony Lessons of Rosenbecker; the Composition Lessons of Protheroe; lessons on How to Teach Music in the Public Schools from Frances E. Clark; lessons in History, Analysis and Appreciation of Music from Glenn Dillard Gunn; lessons on the Pipe Organ by Clarence Eddy; lessons in Singing, given with the aid of the Phonograph, and lessons in Cornet, Violin, Mandolin, Guitar, Banjo, etc., under equally eminent masters.

It also shows why, in the opinion of the foremost musicians of the world, these Correspondence Music Lessons are what Paderewski has called "the most important addition to the pedagogical literature on pianoforte playing published in years, an excellent guide for students. and solid and reliable advice for teachers"; lessons which Walter Damrosch says "serve their purpose in every particular"; and which the Rev. Frank W. Gunsaulus says "will be of great service to the whole realm of musical education"; and which Thomas A. Edison says are "meritorious and worthy"; and which Alexandre Guilmant says are "well graded and easy to follow"; and which Moszkowski says "solve the problem of giving Music Lessons through correspondence in an altogether brilliant manner"; and which S. Coleridge-Taylor says are "astonishingly clear, a living guide and not a mere collection of theoretical details;" and of which Henry T. Finck, New York's leading music critic, says "Were they simply a printed book, it would be one of the best 'Methods' in existence. But they are much more. I know of nothing better calculated to sweep away the cobwebs from the minds of teachers and pupils than the searching, ingenious questions in these lessons"; and which the great Leschetizky says "have been of the greatest interest to me, containing as they do much that is good and stimulating by reason of their having been put forth by a brilliant artist and pedagogue."

But beyond this, and more than this, the book is just a simple little volume to delight the music lover's ears and open his eyes to the marvelous strides that have been made in these modern days, which make it possible for teachers and students to get the best training in music that the world affords, without the inconvenience and expense of leaving home.

It is not a mere conservatory catalogue of names and prices, but is a chatty, readable, fascinating revelation of what is being done by some of the wide-awake, talented, present-day Masters in Music. It is a book full of musical suggestions and usefulness, containing portraits of the world's most eminent musicians, such as Liszt, Busoni, Leschetizky, and others, biographical sketches, and a musical dictionary. In itself it is a musical guide that no music lover can afford to neglect. Correspondence music study has been the subject of considerable discussion among musicians. Every music lover should have the facts on the subject, and know what is being done, and how it is being done. This book shows the consensus of the trained opinion of the world's greatest critics about this new work. It represents the views of not only one or two men, but of a distinguished group of American and European artists. It should prove of wonderful service in the library of any musician.

The book is technically a form of advertising matter—and for this reason we cannot sell it. We have decided, however, that every music lover interested in further study should have an opportunity to possess a copy. Hence this offer. And as a true lover of music cannot help but be interested in this new work, we are confident that we shall be more than repaid in dollars and cents for our expense by spreading broadcast this thoroughly adequate description and explanation of what can be accomplished by high-class correspondence music study.

Every mail brings us inquiries about these booklets from all over the world. We have recently printed a large second edition. Our policy is to answer each request in the order received. As long as the present edition lasts we shall be able to mail the books punctually, but when it gives out there will necessarily be a wait before the next edition is ready for mailing. We suggest, therefore, that you send in your request promptly. If you cannot find your shears, tear the Coupon off Now, fill it out and mail it Today.

Y. M. C. A. ACTIVITIES IN THE WEST INDIES

ONE of the most encouraging and substantial campaigns carried on in recent years for the betterment of young men and boys been conducted by the Young 's Christian Association, under direction of an American Advis- Committee of 170 prominent busi- men residing in the United es and Canada, co-operating with Foreign Department of the Inter- onal Committee, in behalf of the g men and boys of the West In- Islands. This campaign was begun 909, at which time headquarters e established at San Juan, Porto , under the direction of Messrs. rge F. Tibbitts, Secretary for the t Indies; Cameron Beck and rles H. Nuttle, Associate Secreta-he remarkable growth of each de- ment of Association activities is ely due to the energetic and faith- work of the native men of the t Indies. It has been well proved all they need is friendly co-opera- and guidance, and such financial stance as may be necessary to in- uce the different features of Association departments. Who of us would say that this is a timely work and ought to have the most hearty en- agement of the American people? These t millions of most worthy inhabitants of e islands, which lie at our very borders, have n for many years overlooked; and the work t has already been done by the Young Men's istian Association in their behalf has proved, ond a doubt, that they are most ready to do r part fully and are at all times most grate- for any assistance that we may render them. s not this a work, undenominational in its racter and practical in its scope, that will g the people of the West Indies, and the in-American Republics as well, into a closer more friendly relationship with each other with us? Time and space will not permit a report of all the work that has been accom- hed during the past three years, but one g that has stood out most prominently has n the cordial relationships that have existed ween the Association secretaries, our repre- tatives, and all classes of people, irrespective olitical preferences or religious beliefs. The ple have well learned that the association is seeking after power, or those connected with fter honor or financial returns, but is con- ting a campaign in which all may unite to them in their fight for perfect physical, in- ectual, social and Christian manhood.

n January, 1910, a banquet was held in San n, at which time 125 of the most prominent in the city started a campaign for a Young n's Christian Association Building for that . The sum of $50,600 was subscribed imme- tely after, in twenty-four days, largely by the ive men; and the Insular Government of Porto Rico at once gave to the Board of Directors an entire city block valued at $100,000, on which the Association Building is now being erected, and will be dedicated on November 1. No one can question the need of such an institution in the West Indies. As this will be the first Association Building to be erected, we cannot help but realize that there is not one well-equipped gymnasium with intelligent supervision in all of the islands, and practically no medical or physical instruction given to the young men and boys; that there is not a modern business college and that there are few night educational classes for those who are employed during the day. Those who know the conditions that exist throughout the tropics will recognize at once the tremendous need for attractive social features, surrounded by Christian environment.

The New Post Office, Kingston, Jamaica

Associations have also been established among the working classes called peons, especially those employed in the sugar mills. Guanica has two such buildings, with a trained general secretary in charge, and plans are being drawn for three other buildings, which will be located in Porto Rico and Cuba. There are also County Associations established throughout Porto Rico and Jamaica. Thousands of young men and boys have been reached through these branches; Bible classes organized; Gospel meetings conducted; literary societies and outdoor athletic features established. Jamaica, as well as Porto Rico, has made remarkable progress and the native young men have shown their ability to concentrate, persevere and successfully carry out the important plans which have been outlined by the traveling secretaries. All the young people of Porto Rico have learned to speak the English language fluently since the American occupation, and are now seeking constantly for other features that will develop them into all-around useful lives according to American standards.

A Canal Scene in Jamaica

The American people are beginning to realize that these neighbors have been very much neglected in the past, and that we, as a nation, do owe this part of the Western Hemisphere some consideration. We are reminded that the capital city of Santo Domingo was the first land colonized in the Western Hemisphere, and here we find, beyond question, the mortal remains of Columbus, the discoverer of America. Many other heroic souls that have made what we now have possible, have been buried in this famous old city. Until recently we have known little or nothing of the 700,000 people of the Dominican Republic, or how we, as a strong nation, might help them. The Young Men's Christian Association has answered the question in a very practical way, by striking at the basis of the trouble in an endeavor to train the youth physically,

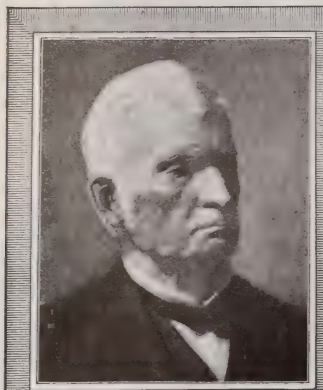
FIFTY-FIVE YEARS WAITING ON GO



J. C. Lanphier

The Anniversary Service at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting

George H. Dowkonnt

FOR fifty-five years the Fulton Street Noonday Prayer Meeting in New York has been a power in the religious life of the metropolis and of the nation. Organized in 1857, the year of America's great revival, it has flourished, under the blessing of the Holy Spirit, to the present day, and on September 23 the fifty-fifth anniversary of its founding was celebrated by special services at the noon hour and in the evening. Business men united with clergymen and evangelists in testifying to the spiritual benefits received at this place where the Scriptures are believed in, the Son of God honored, and the Holy Spirit given the right of way.

Mr. William Phillips Hall, who presided at the noon service, reminded the audience that the revival of 1857 was born in the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting. He quoted the late Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler in estimating that at least one hundred thousand people were converted during that awakening. Aside from this great ingathering, whose beginnings can be traced to this source, the blessings received directly from the noonday service held year after year have been innumerable. Mr. Hall, continuing, said: "We have no record, because it is established on high. When we examine that record we shall be astonished to find how very many have been helped and benefited by this Fulton Street Noon Prayer Meeting. Business men have come to this place again and again greatly burdened; mothers have sent requests asking prayer for their children; and many requests have been received from all parts of the world. This is a place where we meet God and God meets with us."

It is surely an impressive change from the clatter and strife of the street to pass into the shelter of this quiet place of prayer.

Many souls have learned that "man does not live by bread alone"; many have also been guided and helped in the details of their daily tasks. From their inception, fifty-five years ago, these noonday meetings have been held continuously on every week-day, including holidays.

In the addresses and testimonies delivered at the anniversary many words of affectionate and gratified praise were spoken of the earlier leaders of the meeting, J. C. Lanphier, C. F. Cutter, F. N. Jacobs, and words of appreciation for the present superintendent, Dr. George H. Dowkonnt. One friend, stating that he had attended as a newspaper reporter the first anniversary of the meeting in 1858, said: "I was acquainted with that gentleman whose picture I am looking upon (Mr. Lanphier) and the fragrance of his pure life has been with me until this hour." Another spoke of a Testament which he had received, when a young man, from Mr. Lanphier; John H. Wyburn, superintendent of the McAuley Mission on Water Street, said: "I remember him well. What an inspiration he was to me! On one occasion he told me about a better time that was in store for me if I was faithful to Jesus Christ." Mr. Wyburn stated that S. H. Hadley first brought him to the Fulton Street meeting, and that he remembered still the blessedness of that hour. "I represent the old Jerry McAuley Mission, where we believe in the Christ who can make men over new. I thank God for leading Dr. Dowkonnt to this place. I have known him for many years and know that he believes in the whole Gospel."

Among the others who spoke were Mr. S Burr, Mr. Andrew Wood, Mr. Sidney Perrin, Mr. Norman Raymond, representing the John S Noonday Prayer Meeting. The Rev. W. Tucker, D.D., of Los Angeles, Calif., made the cipal address at both the noon and evening ser of the anniversary. Mr. C. D. Wood, Rev. Ge S. Avery, Rev. George Douglas, Mrs. Richard H ley, Rev. T. M. Shilford, Rev. Robert McE Captain Pennington and many others, inclu strangers, gave words of testimony and exhort during the service. The Fulton Street Male Q tet, which sings at the regular noonday meet rendered a number of selections at both serv The quartet has proved a very attractive and ful feature of the work. W. H. VanSteenbu chairman of the prayer-meeting committee, wa presiding officer of the evening session of the a versary.

Dr. George H. Dowkonnt was appointed sup tendent of the Fulton Street Noon Prayer Mee on May 19, 1911, having been in charge of the vices for some months before his formal app ment. The report for 1911 showed a ma increase in attendance. The total attendance the year was 19,235, an increase of 4,949, or ne 25 per cent. over the previous year. A we paper, The Call to Prayer, is published under auspices of the meeting. Officially the Fu Street Meeting is under the jurisdiction of the legiate Reformed Church of New York. Dr. I konnt happens to be a Baptist, and no denom tional lines are drawn in the splendid work of organization.

intellectually, socially and morally, for indeed this is the secret of good government as well as character building.

The most neglected of all these neighboring islands, however, is Haiti, with its 2,500,000 people. One often hears it said that this is a republic, where they have constant turmoil, revolution and murder. Possibly true; but why should we let such criticisms prejudice us and keep us from doing our duty towards these very needy people? The Young Men's Christian Association secretaries have well learned that there are many noble people among them, who are sincere, reliable and worthy of our most generous and hearty co-operation. It is not color that makes a man or a woman, but character, and with the proper influence, example and assistance of the American nation, the Haitians would no doubt rise to be a most praiseworthy people. There are multitudes of most worthy citizens among them ready to be taught if we will teach, and ready to follow an upward course if we will but show them the way. We only need to ask ourselves the question, as Americans, "Are we responsible for the development of Haitian character?" and we answer emphatically, "Yes, morally; for this nation, through its Monroe Doctrine, is responsible for all of the people

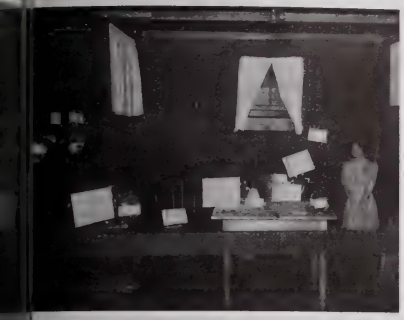
R. ULTIMATE CONSUMER AND THE TARIFF



Object Lesson in What High Tariffs Add to e Prices of Kitchen Furniture and Utensils

A Silent Sermon on "Protective" Tariffs

In the Dining-Room; Every Article Ticketed to Show What Tariffs Have Done to Its Price

UR friendly old enemy, "The High Cost of Living," has at last succeeded in doing something else beside squeeze a squeal of distress out of poor little Mr. nate Consumer. It has bumped the crani- of our national politicians with sufficient e to leave a noticeable dent, and as a result thing is going to happen to the tariff. Of se things have been happening to the tariff own through the years of politics, but this it looks as if something real were afoot—thing to record in the annals of history er than of mere politics. Tariffs high and tariffs low have made the bat- lds of many a campaign of the past, but this time it is for tariffs lower—uickly and as safely as possible. All are agreed on this, and the battle as hot not as to the why—we all feel that—but as to the how.

ne of the presidential nominees said a few weeks ago:

t is not as easy for us to live as it used to be. Our money will not buy as h. High wages, even when we can get them, yield us no great comfort. used to be better off with less, because a dollar could buy so much more. majority of us have been disturbed to find our- s growing poorer, even though our earnings slowly increasing. Prices climb faster than an push our earnings up." And that the other idates for office are convinced that this is the is shown by the fact that all are promising something—perhaps a rather indefinite some- g—shall be done to the existing law. The Re- can platform proclaims itself for a "protective ff," saying, "some of the existing import duties oo high and should be reduced." For this pur- it has decided that Congress should be guided e reports of expert investigation boards. The ressive Party, too, is in favor of a "protective ff," but it asserts that "no industry deserves ection which is unfair to labor or which is oper- g in violation of federal law." It agrees with thers that "the present tariff is unjust to the le" and urges the "establishment of a non- isan scientific tariff commission reporting both e President and Congress." The Democratic orm makes no bones about its statement that overnment has "no right or power to impose or ct tariff duties except for the purpose of reve- Appended to this statement its platform s the "immediate downward revision of exist- luties."

r. Ultimate Consumer, by this time firmly con- d that something really is going to happen, is g his little double-shuffle of joy and devouring paign literature by the acre in an attempt to e up his mind to just which of the three doctors who are so anxious to at- his case he will entrust his national life for the next four years.

New York, where the giant High Cost of Living sits down with his great- eight on the pocketbook of Mr. Ultimate Consumer, somebody decided to a demonstration of just how this operation was performed. So now, if Ultimate Consumer happens to pass along the Broadway side of Union re, he is sure to have his attention attracted by a husky, leather-lunged g man, who sits at the door of a large shop s the way, and barks forth the attractions Tariff Chamber of Horrors. Judging the live goat and crate of five contented, ting little porkers in the window, one is quite sure as to what he is going to find e. A venture within, however, will prove m that for once tariff figures, which are, as le, so deadly dull and uninteresting, have made to stand out in a graphic fashion h impresses him before he realizes it.

e of the most startling things which he at hand as soon as he goes inside the door demonstration of the purchasing power of dollar as applied to sugar. Here he will that whereas sixteen pounds of sugar now be bought for a dollar, twenty-five ds would come at the same price were it or our high tariff wall that protects the infant sugar industries of this country. Hanging just above the barrels and bags of sugar there is a large card for which "a committee of wholesale grocers, formed to assist in obtaining cheaper sugar for consumers through reductions of duties on raw or refined sugar" is responsible. A glance at this will give him the comforting information that at the present time sugar pays a duty of 78.87 per cent., while champagne pays 70 per cent., automobiles 45 per cent., and diamonds 10 per cent. About the time he has thoroughly digested the meaning of this one exhibit to his pocketbook, he commences to feel the force of the sign which decorates the cage of the sorrowful-looking goat in the window. That reads: "Must the consumer always be a goat? This animal looks it. You are it."

Moving slowly down the side of the room he will be astonished by the number of places in which the demonstration shows how the foreigner gets the best of it. He will discover a sewing machine for which $30 was asked in New York. The export price of this machine is $18.62. Now, allow the foreign retailer to add 33 1-3 per cent. for carriage charges, general expenses and legitimate profit, and that sewing machine will sell in England, or Holland, or Mexico, for between $24 and $25. On a nearby table he will find a number of articles bearing label cards, which are apt to fill his soul with envy of those who live somewhere else besides in the United States. For example, a coat of Irish frieze which looks particularly alluring in these first cool days of fall, bore the label, "Was bought in London for $27.50, and $60 was asked for a similar coat in New York." An exhibit of tools bore such signs as this: "This plumb level cost us $1.88. It is offered for export at 57 cents. Allowing foreign retailer 25 per cent., 14 cents, his selling price will be 71 cents. The difference against us, $1.17."

So it went, down through all the list of things shown upon the table; the hammer, the screwdriver and the trowel, the frying pan, the teapot and the coffee-pot. The Taylor scoop cost in this country $1. It sells for export at 58 cents. Now if we allow the foreign retailer 25 per cent. on his investment, he will add 15 cents, making his selling price about 73 cents. So it proved, too, for the shovel, the shoes, and the typewriter. The latter, which sells at $90 in New York, can be bought in London for the equivalent of about $69.

Down at the farthest end of the room there is a lifelike representation of an ordinary little home with all the necessities for its living-room, bedroom and kitchen. Here each article is marked with its price and in nearly every case the proportion of that price which represents the duty levied, for the protection of American-made goods, upon similar articles when they are imported. The small iron stove, for which $11.75 was paid, has 45 per cent. "protection." The kitchen table, the frying-pan and the teakettle are all in the list and pay respective duties of 35, 40 and 50 per cent. In one corner of the bedroom a wax figure, representing the mother of the household, sits beside a white willow baby carriage, which cost $15, 45 per cent. of this being due to our present tariff system.

A $5 iron crib and a white iron bedstead, marked $7.50, demand 45 per cent. duty each. Two feather pillows, marked $4, are burdened with a 20 per cent. duty. The cotton and felt mattresses, worth $13.50, has 20 per cent. duty. Cotton and wool blankets, sold for $3.98, carry 75 per cent. duty.

An oak dresser near the crib, with its small toilet articles, is a whole sermon in itself. The dresser is worth $10, while the duty is 35 per cent. of its value. A hairbrush worth $1 must stand 40 per cent. duty. Four Turkish towels at 25 cents each carry a duty of 45 per cent. Two pairs of women's gloves carry 50 per cent. of duty. A duty of 55 per cent. is added to a 13-cent woman's handkerchief.

Conclusion? Well, Mr. Ultimate Consumer is just now very busy arriving at one which he will announce to the world on next November 5.

The Unchangeable Christ

A Sermon

Rev. H. H. McQuilkin *

TEXT: "The same yesterday and to-day, yea and forever." Heb. 13: 8, R. V.

THESE words contain an exhortation to constancy of faith based on the changelessness of Jesus Christ and the changelessness of the human heart. "Imitate their faith. . . . Be not carried away by divers and strange teachings"—that is the exhortation: "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and to-day, yea and forever"—that is the changelessness of the Redeemer: "Remember them that had the rule over you, who spake unto you the word of life"—that is the changelessness of the human heart.

It is immutability calling for fidelity; fixity demanding faith; stability invoking steadfastness; abiding reality inviting abiding repose. This heavenly correspondence lies at the center of the secret of successful living. Spencer tells us that life is correspondence with environment. The definition is operative in the spiritual world, is operative here. The attitude of conformity brings the certitude of completion. Fundamental changelessness in life must be matched by fundamental constancy in adherence. How deep and thoroughgoing it all is!

A Timely Exhortation

The exhortation is always timely, because the necessity for the correspondence is always timeless. And the timeliness is accentuated by the fact that although the correspondence is necessary for man, it is, alas! not natural to him. There is a perpetual tendency to hanker after novelty. The present day witnesses an almost vehement chase after new things. We have the "new psychology" and the "new theology" and the "new thought." Truth seems sometimes to have become a matter of the calendar. The old is identified with the obsolete. Only the new is supposed to be true. Of course it is only a tendency, but it is a very marked tendency that needs to be carefully observed and guarded. The ambition for the untried may become a mania. Progressiveness may degenerate into apostasy, forgetting that true progress consists of motion plus direction. Insurgency may easily pass over into philistinism. The suspiciousness in the popular mind against the "faith once delivered to the saints" may be unhealthy: the state of flux in our thinking may be only a disease that needs attention. "Remember, . . . be not carried away"—it is the warning against thoughtlessness and lack of historical perspective and vacillation of mind. Our modern age with its Athenian tendency to spend its whole time "in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing" may well give heed.

The desire for variety is legitimate in its proper place. Regularity in the accidentals of life leads to monotony, and monotony to stagnation. The ministry of change is often most beneficial. Bacon, in one of his essays, advises occasional breaks in the routine of eating and sleeping, as being good for the health. The bow needs to be unstrung once in a while to preserve its elasticity; so also do the nerves. Monotony of surroundings is calculated to break the spirit. Change of scenery, of climate, of food, of associates, ministers relief and refreshment to both body and spirit.

"Behold, I am Alive Forever More!"

But the function of change is limited to the more superficial relationships of life. Our clothes and our food and our dwelling-place—in short, the outer facts—are rendered more beneficial to us by modification and alteration. But when we attempt to put into operation the same principle of variation among the essential and vital things in us and about us, we find straightway that the variation has become vagrancy. And instead of benefit, disaster results. Love cannot alternate with hate without vitiation; honesty falls into dilapidation with one act of knavery. "He that keepeth the whole law, and offendeth in one point, is guilty of all." For law is life, and life has no fellowship with death.

Come back to the Scriptures and see how they continually dwell on permanency in truth and life. It is a cardinal insistence. "Eternal," "everlasting," "abide"—these are words that are on almost every page. "From everlasting to everlasting thou art God." "The lovingkindness of Jehovah is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him." "I, Jehovah, change not." "He that inhabiteth eternity." "He that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Thus does the message of eternal life echo in our ears.

Take the changelessness of Jesus Christ our Lord. He is "the same yesterday and to-day, yea and forever." Career and character are in him alike "without variableness or shadow that is cast by turning." To the Jews who caviled among themselves over the problem of his person he calmly declared, "Before Abraham was, I am." The fact of his eternal existence is crowded into the little word "am." He is the everlasting "present"; there is no past or future tense to him. He is greater than time; he is its Author and Maintainer. Like his Father, with whom he is one, his title in relation to the procession of time is, "I Am."

True, he did appear at a given point in time for the world's redemption. Yet even here his superiority appears, for all history is dated from the event. From his advent Time takes the cue. His manger has become the watershed of earth's chronicles. But more than this, his advent was not a beginning; it was a continuation, although an augmentation. "The name above every name" would be his when he returned to the Father, for he would go back to glory carrying with him a world redeemed. But his glory he "had with his Father before the world was." He was not created in the year 1; he was "manifested." The events in his earthly sojourn were incidents in his perpetually abiding existence. "In him is life." Dr. Dale was right: "Jesus is alive to-day." Every day is an Eastertide to the Christian. "I was dead, and am alive forevermore," he shouted in the exultation of his everlastingness. And with the thrill of his triumphant pæan in our hearts, we hear another pealing anthem rolling down along the corridors of life, and filling millions of souls with rapture inexpressible—"Wherefore he is able to save forever [margin] all them that come unto God through him, seeing that he ever liveth to make intercession for them." Thank God that the Lord Christ will never, never cease to be!

Christ, the Ultimate

But with the unchanging career there abides the unchanging character of Jesus. What he was when he was on earth, that he is to-day and ever will be. Take his character as it is portrayed by the four evangelists; analyze it into its constituent elements, and then prolong them into eternal measure, and you have the real Christ. "Yesterday and to-day, yea and forever." The same holiness and the same unselfish love for sinners and the same willingness and power to forgive sins and the same interest in human joys and sorrows, characterize him to-day.

If Jesus were here to-day he would come right down into the common, everyday life of people and participate with them in every wholesome pleasure and pour heavenly illumination over every problem and breathe strength and consolation into every weak and stricken soul. The first century and the twentieth century are both alike to him.

Behold him mingling with the joyous guests at the wedding feast in Cana and hear his ringing laugh as he joins in the pure mirth of the festive occasion. Watch him going out fishing with his disciples, or touching the eyes of blind Bartimeus, or picking up the little babies caressingly in his arms and smiling his love for them into their little upturned faces, or speaking eternal emancipation to the poor fallen girl who poured out the passionate flood of her tears and love that night as she stood at his feet in the house of the aristocratic churchman! "Behold the man!" cried Pontius Pilate. I catch up the cry and emptying it of every trace of pity and filling it with reverent love and adoration, I fling it out among earth's millions.

There is life for a look at the crucified One.

Jesus will never be superseded in excellence. He is the Unapproachable in perfection. "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end." The whole Epistle to the Hebrews is full of the finality of Jesus Christ. He is the ultimate Prophet, the ultimate Priest, the ultimate Sacrifice. On on the author goes in his delineation of the won of the Son of God until at last he breaks ecstatic benediction, and at its very core the "the blood of the everlasting covenant." finality in fitness and function. It is, moreov vital finality. It is not mechanical, not legisla It is the finality of absolute superiority. He a because he excels. This finality that is more than progress; it is destina Jesus is at once the inspirer and the goal of all progress. "The author and finisher of our fa

The Logic of Changelessness

Is it not comforting and satisfying to think in our Saviour we have an absolutely unchan rest for our spirits? Here faith and hope and may find "foundation."

O thou who changest not, abide with me.

Such changelessness must be met with const or it will brand the inconstant heart with pe of the blackest hue. No wonder the Script enter a bitter complaint against "unstea souls," and that James inveighs against the "do minded man, unstable in all his ways," who is the surf of the sea, driven by the winds and tos declaring such vacillation can never receive thing from God.

Turn to the changelessness of human na "Remember them that had the rule over you and considering the issue of their life—" utterance is distilled logic with premises and clusion wrought out of quivering human life. faculties and processes of the human mind a Intelligence, emotions, conscience, will—time ca add to the list and it cannot take away fro Love, hate, hope, despair, aspiration, faith—t are race attitudes; they cannot be dated. tread the same road that our fathers have troc every essential of inner and outer existence. the frills are altered. Whatever has worked well will, in a univ of abiding principles, work well again. The outlook that brought cleansing and resolution symmetry to others will, other things equal, b it to me.

Let Us Not Turn to Look Back

One day, I was riding on the train up over vast prairies of Wyoming with a noted jurist. was a federal judge, and a man of broad and ough culture. We were talking together of claims of Christianity on the mind of man, turning to me he said, with intense emotion in face and voice, "There is one argument that always made skepticism impossible to me." I a him what it was, and he replied, "My father!" federal judge had considered the issue of his fat life, and had imitated his faith.

For nineteen hundred years the Spirit has writing "the Newest Testament," which Jo Cook speaks of as the record of Christ's workin life and history. Take up the sacred volume comes with fresh leaves from the press each m ing and ponder well its pages. The eleventh cha of Hebrews contains no more wonderful exampl sublime and conquering faith. There are the J and the Pauls and the Augustines and the Chry toms and the Calvins and the Luthers and Knoxes and the Wesleys and the Spurgeons and long line of unheralded heroes and heroines of whose names are written in heaven. By the cha lessness of Jesus Christ and by the changeless of mankind, let us avoid promiscuousness of giance. With our hand to the plow, let us not to look back, for thereby we shall evidence our fitness for the kingdom of God.

RS. SANGSTER'S SWEETEST POEM

HERE shall I look for thy little ones, Lord
The lambs of thy scattered folds?
hey out on the mountains bare and bleak, lost in the tangled wolds?
I search for them only in lonely spots, look in the crowded street,
ittle ones who are thine, dear Lord, be brought to thy blessed feet?

cross the ocean, and find them, Lord,
the Hindu's sheltering cot;
take their hands in the Arctic cold, where Southern suns are hot;
gather them in from jungle paths,
ay give them bread to eat,
e hungry and wailing I find them, Lord, guide them straight to thy feet.

lways I need not fare afield hunt for thy children lost; are those anear who are weary and sad, poor and tempest-tossed.
e rich man's home, in the beggar's hut,
e thy loved I meet,
tis angel's work, O pitiful Lord, bring them safe to thy feet.

I plead for the ears to hear, the eyes that are swift to see ittle ones wherever they are,
o are treasures of worth to thee.
ld not turn in the passing throng
m one that I ought to greet, ail to lead by the upward way wanderer to thy feet.

SMOOTHING OUT THE WRINKLES

LIFE is full of wrinkles, and it seems to be a lot easier to increase the supply than to smooth them out. Did you ever notice how much more readily some persons move along the path of the greatest resistance than they do along the line of the least resistance? That means that they are rubbing up wrinkles everywhere they go.

Suppose we step out of the quiet seclusion of the study to-day and try our philosophy in the busy workshop. So often these little talks with CHRISTIAN HERALD folks come from undisturbed meditations in private, and are set down quietly and alone when all seems at peace. I wonder if something of helpfulness cannot come, perhaps, from the noisy, bustling, strenuous place of business.

To-day, all about me on every hand is the rattle and bang of many typewriting machines, going with the eager speed of "piece-workers." Crowded into every available space are girls and men, folding, addressing, recording, stamping, giving instructions. Every few minutes the telephone bell rings, or messengers enter, or deliveries are made, or postmen call, or inquiries demand attention. All the time there is quick moving here and there in narrow, crowded spaces between desks, machines, chairs, and tables. From morning till night is one constant pandemonium fortissimo of noisy but earnest and systematic work. Nerve-racking? No; it might easily be so, but in reality it is a very pleasant pandemonium, a sort of industrial symphony, a musical clatter in tune with which at least one heart is singing and making agreeable melody.

I look over the busy office, and nowhere is a frown. Nowhere any loud or impatient voice is heard. Everyone is doing his or her level best and is glad of it. And right here, in the midst of this noise, and bustle, and interruption, I am thinking of the great family of HERALD readers, all of them busy, no doubt, with their own work in some place appointed. How much pleasanter and more profitable any work becomes when the wrinkles have been smoothed out!

AN ANGRY, insulting letter comes in the mail. The writer is wholly mistaken and has taken no pains to get at the real facts before writing. It is so easy to call a fellow hard names when he is a long way off and you don't know him at all. To some correspondents it seems to be the natural thing, and they go at it with a gusto. Such a letter will raise a wrinkle very quickly, and a hot or sarcastic reply will make the wrinkle bigger with several others to join it. Then business begins to feel the friction and the irritation at both ends of the line, and everybody suffers.

Smooth out the wrinkle at the very beginning with a good-natured reply to the trouble-hunter, setting him straight, and showing him that he is dealing with a friend, and not a bandit. It is almost certain he will come back in the same frank, friendly spirit, and all the wrinkles will disappear. Just as a single amusing illustration, here is an extract from the reply of a hot-tempered chap who had written a ferocious attack upon some imagined enemy only to discover that he had found a friend. Immediately he showed that he, himself, was a jolly good fellow, too. He wrote:

> My comments were not written in a spirit of unfriendliness as you thought, but rather in a spirit of fun. I supposed the letter would be opened by some pretty little stenographer or bookkeeper who would laugh and chalk down the remittance along with the rest. Didn't suppose for a moment that it would be opened by that red-haired one with a fiery temper, who was going to flounce into your private office in a rage and show the sheet to you! My! How I felt like crawling through a knot-hole when I read your letter. My respects to the girl with the red hair, and tell her I'll look out for her after this. I have entire confidence in your firm, and I'll do what I can to help. Kindly accept my apologies.

PERHAPS the sharp ring of the telephone breaks into an important conversation or interrupts the work at some inconvenient moment. How easy it is to rub up a whole regiment of wrinkles during a few minutes on the 'phone. Why is ordinary politeness so often cast aside when one is talking into the transmitter? A single experiment will prove that twice as much can be accomplished to accelerate business if the "wrinkles" are kept out of the wire between the transmitter and the receiver. It is really marvelous how much can be gained by a pleasant voice over the 'phone.

Employees will make mistakes—of course, they will. Even machines slip a cog, or break a pin, or wear out a bearing now and then. The important thing is to reduce these mistakes to the minimum. Harsh criticism rubs up the wrinkles, and just as grit in the bearings of a machine makes mischief, just as the lack of oil causes friction, and heat, and trouble, so the petty irritation of unfair or nervous criticism spoils the smooth action of an office force. Smooth out the wrinkles; keep an atmosphere of good cheer and co-operation in the place of work; drop the oil of a pleasant word of praise and encouragement here and there where it will do good. It will conserve the power, increase the output, and improve the quality of work of the delicate human machine that feels while it works.

BUSINESS has by no means a monopoly of troublesome wrinkles. Every room in the home needs a smoothing process at times, and there are sad wrinkles in many places that need gentle treatment. Here is a little story which will suggest to many busy workers how they may keep the wrinkles out of their own lives, while at the same time they are smoothing them out of others:

> Mary Ellen was only a poor, plain, freckled woman, whose clothes were out of fashion and whose home was mostly in her hot little kitchen, where she did other folks' work. Yet, day by day, as she busily plied her iron, many a humble neighbor would stop by her door for a moment in passing to listen to the quaint old hymns she sang so vigorously.
> "How can you stand all day in this hot room, always ironing, and yet singing so cheerily?" asked a lady who had called to engage her services.
>
> "Ah, ma'am," she replied, "the Lord has given me this work to do; so when I am tired and out of sorts I say to myself that verse about doing things heartily, as unto the Lord, and try to think how I'd feel if I could see him standing right here looking at me and knowing I had an unwilling heart for his tasks. Then I sing a bit, and while my iron is smoothing out the wrinkles in other folks' clothes, I'm thinking how can I smooth out a few rough places in my neighbors' lives.
>
> "There's little Tommy Green in the room above me, has a weakness in the back, and he lies on his cot-bed from morning till night. His mother works in a factory and doesn't come home till dark. When he's lonely and sick with the pain he pounds on the floor with a stick, and I sing the hymns he likes best, and then he lies quiet and hums them over to himself till he falls asleep. Then once in a while I slip up with a cup of water and bits of picture papers that come wrapped round the clothes, and give him a pleasant word. Sure, ma'am, the Lord's so good to me I must try to help make things pleasant for what others I can."

WHEN THE AIRSHIP WENT OVER OUR TOWN

THE bells were set ringing, the whistles all blew,
And every one rushed out of doors;
The street had been empty; first thing that we knew
The people were out there by scores;
The baker was wiping his hands as he ran,
The grocer threw everything down,
The housewife spilled fruit she was trying to can,
When the airship went over our town.

Miss Tompkins stopped short in the midst of a song,
The editor dropped all his proof;
The oldest inhabitant sprinted along,
Then wanted to climb on the roof;
Of course he got dizzy—and so did his wife—
But such an event was the crown
Of all the great things he had seen in his life,
When the airship went over our town.

And we all got such cricks in the backs of our necks
From gazing and gazing so much;
But we all cried, regardless of age or of sex,
"There it is! Well, it does beat the Dutch!"
And we each asked the other, "Would you dare do that If offered the cash and renown?"
But most of us answered, "No, sir!" quick as scat,
When the airship went over our town.

A few daring fellows, who liked to seem brave,
Asserted they "wouldn't be scared,"
But older folk watched it with countenance grave,
And then their convictions declared.
"It's temptin' the fates, and I know it ain't right," Asserted Aunt Tabitha Brown;
"And you won't never ketch me a-tryin' no flight"—
When the airship goes over our town.

Cost of Living 48 Years Ago

A READER of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, A. C. Niver, of Jacksonville, Fla., writes:

"I was clerk in a general merchandise store in 1864. We sold sugar from 20 to 30 cents per pound during the year. Flour was $20 per barrel; kerosene, $1.25 per gallon; rice, 20 cents per pound; and other groceries in proportion. A spool of cotton was 20 cents; brown 4-4 sheeting, 80 cents per yard; calico, 50 cents. Four garments of men's underwear cost $10, that would be $2 now. In 1871 I began a similar business on my own capital. I paid at regular wholesale prices 11⅞ cents per pound for A sugar; $1.65 per pound for best Young Hyson tea, and 70 cents for the cheapest. Maracaibo coffee was 26 cents per pound. I also paid $260 for thirty barrels of flour—none of it the highest standard. Fish and eggs were cheaper than now in the country; all other goods in proportion to the above prices. I have sold rye from the farm for $1.75 per bushel; oats for 95 cents. I was in business for thirty-one years and sold during that period about half a million dollars' worth of general merchandise in a small country store and was familiar with values. I sold cook stoves for $60, which is double the value now. Wagons and farm implements were double the price of to-day."

A Group of Macedonian Brigands

A Scene Near Karaferia, Ancient Berœa

St. Paul's Square and Pulpit, Berœa

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

BERŒA, THE CITY OF THE HIDDEN CHURCHES

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

PAUL and his companions were driven out of Thessalonica by the unbelieving Jews, who were inspired by the meanest of motives, for though they pretended that the new doctrines were subverting the authority of the Roman Empire and setting up a new king, even Jesus, in place of Cæsar, their real purpose in this and other persecutions was that, by the teaching of the apostles, the Gentiles were placed on an equal footing with themselves. Jealousy, selfishness, an absurd sense of superiority over all mankind, and national exclusiveness combined to form this meanest of motives, influenced by which they dogged the footsteps of St. Paul, interrupted his work, sought to discredit his character and destroy his influence. From Antioch to Iconium, from Iconium to Lystra, from Lystra to Derbe, across the great Asian Plateau, across the Ægean to Macedonia, the jealous hatred of the Jews followed him, driving him out of Philippi, and now from Salonica to Berœa he is pursued by the same implacable and unreasoning hatred.

The quiet, self-restrained, almost casual way in which St. Luke records these many persecutions, these constant harryings, these secret flights and hairbreadth escapes from death, is remarkable, as we think of the thrilling tale he had to record. In what vivid colors a romancer might have pictured this wonderful story even without departing from the truth! But the biographer of St. Paul evidently had no wish to produce a sensation, but simply to tell a plain, unvarnished tale, which is all the more effective because he leaves it to the imagination of every reader to supply the exciting and harrowing details.

Paul and Silas were sent away from Thessalonica to Berœa by night. It was a journey of more than forty miles, and probably took the wayfarers fully two days to accomplish it. They did not go by the Via Egnatia, the magnificent road five hundred miles long which we have before described, but by a less important road which led to Berœa, a somewhat obscure town almost directly west of Thessalonica. It may be of interest to compare the description of Paul's journey by a famous traveler, Cousinéry, who wrote many years ago, from personal experience, of the route with the journey as it is now taken by the few foreigners who visit Berœa to-day.

"After leaving the gardens," says Cousinéry, "which are in the immediate neighborhood of Thessalonica, the travelers crossed a wide tract of cornfields, and came to the shifting bed of the 'wide-flowing Axius.' About this part of the journey, if not before, the day must have broken upon them. Between the Axius and the Haliacmon there intervenes another wide extent of the same continuous plain. The banks of this second river are confined by artificial dykes to check its destructive inundations. All the country round is covered with a vast forest, with intervals of cultivated land, and villages concealed among the trees. The road extends for many miles through these woods, and at length reaches the base of the western mountains, where a sharp ascent leads up to the gate of Berœa."

Since this account of the journey was written great changes have occurred even in slow-moving Macedonia. Now the traveler who wishes to visit Berœa takes a morning train on the well-built railway which connects Salonica with Monastir, an important Turkish town on the borders of Albania, noted for its constant outbreaks and scenes of brigandage. Such a train we took in the early days of 1912. The railway station at Salonica was guarded by scores of Turkish soldiers. Our passport was demanded and vizéd, for Macedonia was in a state of great unrest, not only because of the Italian war then raging, but for fear of an Albanian uprising.

After the necessary preliminaries of having our names recorded, our passports vizéd, and our tickets bought, we found ourselves in a comfortable second-class car, bound for the very city to wh Paul was hurried away by night as though he w a criminal fleeing from justice. For a time railway skirts the seashore, and we get glori glimpses of cloud-capped Olympus beyond the sl ing waters of the Thermaic Gulf, rippled by morning breeze.

Soon Olympus is obscured by the nearer mo tains, among which the railroad pushes its pers ent way. We saw none of the great stretches forest that Cousinéry describes, but there are m orchards of mulberry trees, olive groves and vi yards. We also saw many of the small villages which he speaks, but no large town until, a about two hours of travel, the brakeman shouts "Karaferia," and we know that we have come the station for old Berœa. The word that brakeman shouted is the Turkish name, while Greeks call it Verria, and the Slavs know it by monosyllabic name Ber. All the names, howe mean very much the same as the ancient w Berœa, from which they are all derived, which tells of the abundance of water v which, as we shall see, Berœa is blessed to as in ancient times.

The Ancient Library at Berœa

The town lies about a mile from the stat and we find some ancient hacks, drawn equally ancient horses, waiting to carry us the hill. Before we can take a carriage, h ever, our American passport must be ag vizéd, and our visiting cards handed to polite station master in order to assure that we are neither revolutionists nor ar chists, nor Albanians bent upon the dest tion of the city.

Through pleasant groves of mulberry t our road passes, constantly climbing, until come to the outskirts of modern Berœa, w is situated on the exact site of the ancient to which Paul fled. Though not one of great towns of antiquity, Berœa has a hist of which it is justly proud. It was founde thousand years before any of the great c of Europe, saving perhaps Rome and Ath Its inhabitants were evidently wise in t day and generation, and understood the conquering power of Rome, for it was first city that surrendered to the Rom after the battle of Pydna in the year 168 B Some fifty years before our Lord's adv Pompey's conquering infantry went into w ter quarters there, but it was not till s fifty years after Christ was born that man who was destined to make Berœa fam for all time entered the city, a lonely fugit to find quiet refuge for a few weeks or mo in hospitable Berœa.

Now, as then, it is a busy city of some 000 people, and a very mixed population i consisting of gipsies and Jews, Wallachs Greeks, Albanians and Turks. The Gre are in a majority, however, and num

A FRESH OUTBREAK IN LAWRENCE

As a result of the labor disturbances which took place in Lawrence, Mass., last winter and spring, that city was again, on September 30, a scene of fierce rioting and scores of conflicts between mill-workers and the police. The occasion of the lawlessness was the first "demonstration strike" which has ever been called in this country. The trial of Joseph J. Ettor, Arturo Giovannitti and Joseph Caruso in connection with the death of Anna Lopizzo, who was killed during last winter's trouble, opened in Salem on that date and the labor leaders called upon the forty thousand operatives of the cotton and woolen mills of Lawrence to go upon strike for twenty-four hours in protest against this trial and to show their unanimity and power. From the point of view of those who had made these plans, the strike, as a demonstration, was an abject failure. Only about seven thousand of the operatives responded to the call, and many, either by intimidation or by the closing of departments, caused about five thousand others to remain away from work.

The worst of the rioting occurred at the opening of the mill gates in the morning. Pickets armed with revolvers, knives, sledge-hammers, iron bolts and other weapons, attempted to stop operatives from going into the mills. When the police tried to maintain order, the pickets struggled with them desperately. Swinging their clubs with effect the bluecoats drove back the rioters. A score of arrests were made, many of the prisoners having cracked heads, while there were many others who escaped through the crowds to their homes with bleeding heads and bruised faces. Men, women and children on their way to work were held up and assaulted by strikers or sympathizers.

A short time before the hour for opening the mills a stream of operatives began to pour through the side streets leading to the factories. The pickets intercepted them and attempted to prevent them from entering the mill gates. Lunch baskets were snatched and hurled into the faces of the women and children. One gray-haired woman was rescued, with two companions, from a group of pickets who had bruised her face. Fathers and brothers, some of them armed, escorted daughters and sisters to the mills. Cars bearing workers were intercepted by pickets and stalled for a time. Private automobiles were used as patrol wagons by the police. Timid women operatives were taken in charge by the police and conveyed by automobiles to their mills.

The strike was called and conducted by the Industrial Workers of the World, though the leaders of that organization claimed that they could not be held responsible for the disturbances as they had cautioned the workers against any violence. They claim that the trouble was caused by some of the more excitable young men among the operatives. This statement, though made in all sincerity by one of the leaders, must have weighed against it a statement made in one of the addresses which Carlo Tresca, an Italian newspaper editor of Pittsburg, and one of the leaders in the strike, made at a mass meeting. Fearing that the statement had been misunderstood, Tresca was requested to translate it into English, which he did by putting it in this form: "If Ettor, Giovannitti, and Caruso are found guilty, or either of them is found guilty, the Industrial Workers of the World will march to Salem, storm the jail and rescue the prisoners, if possible."

The clashes between the police and the strikers were marked in almost every instance by a harvest of broken heads, for the police, armed with their night-sticks, did not hesitate to strike out right and left. This proved a not unwise precaution, though it seemed uncalled-for at the moment, because when those who had been arrested were searched, a regular little arsenal of weapons was found secreted upon their persons. Revolvers, knives of different sorts, brass knuckles, slung-shots, and other implements of violence were among the things confiscated. Several of the knives and revolvers were new, and, in some cases, still bore the price tags.

It is reported that the disturbances of September 30 have alienated from the textile workers the sympathy of a large part of the citizens of Lawrence. Mayor Scanlon said that evening, when the trouble had quieted down to a great extent:

"I estimate that fully 90 per cent. of the people of Lawrence refuse to condone this last strike or the actions of the strikers. Their sympathy, which was with the strikers during the previous fight, is now solidly against them. I look for no more trouble and expect that all the workers will go back to their places to-morrow. I believe they are to blame for the rioting this morning. They had no permit to parade and no permission to flaunt banners symbolizing anarchy."

Two-thirds of all the inhabitants. The winter population is much larger than the summer, for then the Wallachian shepherds with their families come down from the surrounding mountains and make this city their abode during the stormy months of the year.

As we approached Berœa, we were struck with the beauty of its situation. Its white minarets glisten in the sunlight. The many trees which line the streets remind us of some of our own tree-embowered cities, like the two Portlands of America on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. Beyond the town rise tiers of glorious mountains, snow-capped through much of the year, and sparkling streams carry down their sides and flow through the very heart of Berœa. To be sure, the promise of the more distant view is not altogether fulfilled as we enter the precincts of the city, for the first section in which we come is the gipsy settlement, and the swarthy, black-eyed, unkempt sons and daughters of the race gaze curiously at us from every shop and doorway. The gipsies are iron-workers, for the most part, and their streets resound with the anvil chorus of the forge and the clangor of the hammers on the metal.

Almost at the moment we entered the town a shot was heard, and a policeman who was trying to disarm an Albanian, who was carrying weapons contrary to the law, was laid low. So far as we could learn the Albanian quietly walked off unpursued, while the poor policeman breathed his last on the train that took us back to Salonica that same afternoon, as he was being carried to the hospital. Such an incident, seemingly commonplace, told volumes about the Albanian peril, and the antipathies between the irreconcilable races of Macedonia. In spite of the murder, things seemed to go on quietly and peacefully enough in the streets of Berœa. The merchants in the tiny shops sold their goods in leisurely fashion. Little girls, with crooked knitting needles, plied them industriously as they walked along. The unusual advent of four strangers (for an American missionary and a Greek pastor accompanied us) seemed to give the Berœans no little diversion as we made our way with interested curiosity through the narrow streets.

All sorts and conditions of men we passed and repassed. Wallachs in white leggings and shaggy flocknous, or shepherd's coat over their shoulders; stout-limbed Albanians that look like ballet girls in their white fustanelles; Jewish women with quaint head-dresses; Turks in trousers that look like blue meal-bags, and Greeks in modern European costume, all make a strange and picturesque variety in this living panorama.

Everywhere is the abundant water which gave the city its name; gushing from the hillsides, flowing through the streets, bubbling up in innumerable fountains, dashing and splashing down through the steep walled-in channels, as the water comes down at Lodore.

The Wallachian courtyards are the most picturesque. They are surrounded by extensive walls, and within each courtyard is a multitude of huts; in each hut several rooms, and in each room a shepherd's family.

Many curious sights we see. There is a huge tower in recent ruin. Great blocks of stone lie around in confusion, and piles of broken brick, mortar and masonry declaring what a mighty structure must have once existed there.

The intelligent and wealthy Greek gentleman who kindly served as our guide told us that this tower, which had been sealed up by the Turks since the twelfth century, had lately been destroyed by the "Young Turks," and that for a curious reason. It seems that in the eleventh and twelfth centuries Berœa was in the height of its power. It was a city larger and more important than Salonica even, but it was betrayed to the Turks by a recreant Christian, and the punishment of the traitor, according to tradition, was that he must wander around the tower night after night through all the centuries until the Christians came again and he should give the keys of the city back to their former owners. This tradition, with the hope of future Christian domination, so pervaded the city that the Young Turks, it is said, destroyed the Traitor's Tower, which contained a great library, in order that the force of the superstition might be broken. I take this story, however, with several grains of salt, and have no doubt that some of its embellishments at least were supplied by hatred of the "Young Turks."

There are thirty-two mosques in Berœa, and we were amused to see that the gravestones in front of one of the most modern and beautiful of these was used as a clothes-yard, and that various nether garments of the priests were drying on the tombstones.

But by far the most interesting sight to the modern traveler in Berœa is that of the "hidden churches," concerning which the outside world appears to know absolutely nothing. I have consulted many volumes of commentaries and descriptive writings, the scanty guide-books of Macedonia, and all other available sources of information, and find no remotest allusion to this most interesting feature of Berœa. Even the missionaries and Greek Christians of Salonica, forty miles away, so far as I could learn, had never heard of them. But the wealthy Greek gentleman who volunteered to be our guide rightly considered them the most interesting and unique feature of Berœa. There are no less than seventy-two of these hidden churches which were tucked away in all sorts of obscure and undreamed-of corners, when, some hundreds of years ago, the Greeks were in deadly fear of Turkish persecution. It would be difficult for a stranger to find a single one of these churches, but our guide, who had been born and reared in Berœa, was familiar with the location of many of them.

No outward sign gave a hint that a church was anywhere in the vicinity, but he would lead us through crooked, narrow streets with overhanging balconies, whose upper stories almost touched each other; then would enter a courtyard where a family, or perhaps a dozen families, lived, and where the housemothers were cooking the noon-day meal, or doing the weekly washing. Out of this courtyard another door would open into a still narrower yard, and there at the end, perhaps, we would see a door with a rude cross marked in charcoal or in chalk upon it.

One of the inhabitants of this inner courtyard would be found to have the key of the door, and, opening it, would usher us into a tiny church, perhaps not more than ten feet square, but in it we would always see one or more icons or pictures of Christ and the saints, covered with tinsel or gold-foil, except for their hands and faces. There would also be a row of candle spikes on which to impale the tapers so freely used in Greek worship, an altar, and a holy of holies behind a painted curtain.

Some of these churches were much larger than such a one as I have described, and on the further side there was often a way of egress, sometimes an underground passage, so that if the persecuting Turks should catch the worshipers at their devotions they might escape massacre by fleeing in

The Korean "Conspiracy" Trial

IT IS unfortunate that the first important official act of the new Japanese régime in Korea should have been marked by what has all the aspects of a grave miscarriage of justice. In the trial of the notorious conspiracy case at Seoul, just ended, one hundred and six Koreans—all of them professing Christians, several of them pastors, and many of them church leaders—were condemned to penal servitude for terms varying from five to ten years. Seventeen young students were acquitted on the ground of insufficient evidence, although under severe police compulsion they made confessions similar to the others, who were convicted. Some who had clearly proved an alibi were sentenced with the rest. In passing judgment the court ignored the charges that prisoners had been tortured into making confessions. Although in the early stages of the trial the names of several well-known American missionaries had been introduced in the court proceedings, obviously with the purpose of implicating them as having knowledge of the so-called conspiracy, no American missionary was even mentioned in the final charge. This remarkable case has attracted world-wide attention, largely on account of the sweeping though unproved claims of the prosecution and because of the evident animus it showed to Christian missions. To the unbiased mind, the whole dark drama resolves itself into an effort to crush Christianity in Korea by extreme measures. From such evidence as has been permitted to come to light, there has been no adequate proof of any plot against the governor general. Persecution has never succeeded in crushing Christianity, but has always strengthened it, and the official crusade against the native Christian leaders in Korea, discreditable as it is to its conductors, will react and make the "new faith" stronger than ever. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church."

The Ulster Covenant

SEPTEMBER 28 will pass into history as the day upon which forty thousand representative Protestant citizens of Ulster signed a solemn "covenant" or protest against Home Rule for Ireland. Proclaiming themselves loyal British subjects, they declared in their "covenant" their belief that Home Rule would be disastrous to the well-being of their own native province and the whole country, destructive to their citizenship, and subversive of civil and religious freedom. Therefore, they pledged themselves unitedly to oppose it, and in the event of a Home Rule Parliament being forced upon them, they bound themselves to refuse to recognize its authority. This is the substance of one of the most remarkable documents in British politics in a generation at least. Ulster equals a fourth of the total area of Ireland, and has a population of 1,581,696, of which 386,947 are in Belfast. It is the wealthiest and most influential of the provinces. In 1911 the religious divisions were as follows: Roman Catholic, 690,816; Protestant Episcopalians, 366,773; Presbyterians, 421,410; Methodists, 48,816; all others, 53,881. The Catholics or Nationalists thus represent only 43 per cent. of the whole population, but the Protestants or Unionists, while little larger in numbers, are the commercial and business backbone of Ulster. Their great public demonstration at the signing of the Covenant has brought about a startling condition of affairs in Ireland, and even the conservative London Times perceives in the movement a serious menace which calls for the ablest skill and generalship of the Liberal government if the Home Rule measure now before Parliament is to be saved from utter defeat and a cabinet crisis averted. It is significant of the scope of the Ulster revolt that it has won to its support not only the leaders of the Conservative Party, but many men of title and influence besides. Such men as Lord Londonderry, Sir Edward Carson the Unionist leader, the Marquis of Salisbury, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Charles Beresford, Bonar Law and Arthur J. Balfour, have made common cause with the men of Ulster. Even the leading bishops of the Protestant dioceses, clergy of various denominations and members of Parliament have advocated their cause on the public platform, urging that to subject them forcibly to Home Rule would be to violate all British ideals and traditions of the honor and recognition due to those who have always been loyal to the Union.

That Home Rule—to which the Nationalists have looked forward so hopefully for many years—is seriously jeopardized by the Ulster movement cannot be doubted. The measure must be passed three times by the House of Commons, the last time after an interval of two years, before the veto of the House of Lords can be overridden and the bill becomes law. To grant self-government to Ireland, as Britain has done to her colonies, it was hoped would bring prosperity to that country, and it was therefore urged as a political and economic necessity. If the protest of Ulster were grounded in the desire to prevent the people of Ireland from obtaining justice, their covenant would be an unworthy one. But it is something far different which actuates them. These usually orderly, sober and law-abiding men of Ulster represent the attitude and feeling of the whole Protestant population of Ireland, and, we might add, of Great Britain also, who foresee as one result of Home Rule the political supremacy of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. They know by the stern lessons of the past what that supremacy means. They remember the record of oppression of the Irish agriculturist under Catholic domination, the over-taxation and the religious persecution that drove so many out of the country. They value their present freedom from these evils, and are resolved to proceed to any extremes rather than submit to the old evil yoke. They point to the loyal record of their province, and demand to know why she should now be made a victim. William Watson's impassioned verses in the London Times describe the feeling of Protestant England:

> Oh, when has constancy firm and deep
> Been proven so oft yet held so cheap?
> She had only asked that none should sever—
> None should divorce us, nothing divide;
> She had only asked to be ours for ever,
> And this was denied!
> This was the prayer of the heart of Ulster,
> To them that repulsed her
> And flung her aside!

Although the Covenant of the men of Ulster does not contemplate anything beyond a passive resistance to the authority of a Dublin Parliament, and the refusal to pay taxes, it is not difficult to see where such a situation would ultimately lead. Civil war would probably be the outcome. There is, of course, a fair likelihood of the present agitation resulting in the defeat of Home Rule or its indefinite postponement through the collapse of the Liberal-Labor-Nationalist coalition. But it is not "Home Rule" but "Rome Rule" which is the real objective point of Ulster's protest, and no assurance from any political party can meet the situation.

Ill-Considered Legislation

THERE is a strong probability that the newsp per legislation which was attached as a rider the Post Office Appropriation Bill, which pass hurriedly in the closing hours of the last session Congress, will be subjected to the test of constit tionality before the courts. It requires newsp pers, daily and weekly, and other publicatio (excepting religious, fraternal, scientific, and tra journals), to make sworn reports twice a year the government, of ownership, management, e dence of debt, figures of net paid circulation, ma ing of all paid reading notices with the wo "advertisement," etc., failure to comply being pu ishable by exclusion from the mails, and in the c of reading notices unmarked, by a fine of from $ to $500. It is a piece of restrictive legislation, a one of which even the Post Office officials, who a compelled to enforce it, are heartily ashamed. is an attempt at press supervision which is who out of place in a free republic. It is design to interfere with the influence of the press throu indirect means, by meddling quite unnecessarily w the details of its business. Even putting the mi est construction upon the new law, it is a piece paternalism that is thoroughly un-American a out of tune with all the traditions of our peop It cannot be interpreted otherwise than as an tempt to establish an official inquisition of the pr by methods that can do no good, and which w unjustly hamper and do much harm to a very la class of publications. The fact that the religio papers of the country are not affected by the n law does not blind us to the danger involved to t great mass of other publications if such legislati should become established. It would be the beg ning of the end of independent journalism in t country—or, as a distinguished legal authority h characterized it—"an entering wedge looking to timate federal regulation of the newspapers." trust soon to see a test of this amazing measu before the proper tribunal, and we have little do of the result.

Forgetting God

THERE is an old legend of the Jews which lates that long ages ago there lived on the sho of the Dead Sea a tribe of men utterly given up pleasure and covetousness—the lust of the flesh, lust of the eye, and the pride of life. To them prophet was sent to warn them of righteousn and judgment to come, and to try to awaken th souls to high and holy thoughts, and bring th back to the knowledge of God and heaven. T listened to him, admired his preaching and agr that it all sounded very good; but they said he w too far, that it was too difficult; that their pres way of life was very pleasant and they saw great need of change. At length they began to tired of his admonitions, and so he went his w Long afterwards, when some travelers passed that way, says the legend, they found these fool people changed into dumb beasts. Having made use of their souls, they had lost them. They l given themselves up to folly, and now folly H taken to herself her own. They had fancied, people do every day, that this world is a pl ground, where every one has to amuse himself he likes best; or a great market or gambling-hou where the most cunning wins most of his neighbo money. They had lost their faith and forgot God and spiritual things, and now those thi were hid from their eyes. Only every Sabb there came over the poor wretches a dim remi brance of the past.

How many, in our day, are like those dwellers the Dead Sea! Legend though it be, it convey lesson not to be overlooked. One of our later pc has written of a "Land of Lost Souls." May n of us ever enter that dark and hopeless land. M we never permit our hearts to be so filled with allurements of worldly pleasure, the struggle wealth or power, or the sensuous charm of l that the divine image in us shall become dim effaced. Israel forgot God and fell into idola and wickedness that sapped the national life character. The land that oppresses the poor, t sacrifices to mammon, that permits vice to flou unchecked in high and low places, that makes executes unjust laws, and that is totally indiffer to the call of the soul—such a land forgets God cannot escape divine indignation save by natio repentance. History is filled with the records nations that have been blotted out for their s "So are the paths of all that forget God."

The Welsh Musical Festival

EARLY in September last the great Welsh annual national musical festival, which is known as the Eisteddfod, was held at Wrexham, Wales. This festival has been an annual celebration for many years among the Welsh people. The national costumes are worn, and the ancient order of the bards, who trace the lineage of their order back to the days of the Druids, crown a new member. The winner of the honor this year was Mr. T. Herbert Parry Williams, who, with his poem entitled "Gerald the Welshman," surpassed every effort which has been made in connection with these festivals for some years. The honor which he won is signified by a crown and velvet cap of the ancient Welsh pattern, and is accompanied by a prize of $100.

The Welsh people have been noted for their musical ability. The harp, their national instrument, perhaps nowhere else has so many adept players. During the past year the music of Wales attracted considerable attention because of the revival in that principality of so many customs which had been allowed to die out for a time. The investiture of the Prince of Wales at Carnarvon was marked by the singing of a choir of ten thousand voices in the old Welsh language. The strongest appeal to the intellect is through the eye; the heart is reached most readily through the ear. How the heart is softened and clothed and inspired by melody of instrument or voice! Music has ever formed an important part in the life of a nation, and in the services of divine worship. The musical society among the children of Israel was early organized.

And David spake to the chief of the Levites to appoint their brethren to be the singers with instruments of music, psalteries and harps and cymbals, sounding, by lifting up the voice with joy. (I. Chron. 15: 16.)

Legally Dead, Inherits Fortune

TWENTY years ago John C. Beck, then a youth of nineteen, ran away from his father's house in Edinburgh, Scotland, and came to the United States. He toured the country with a theatrical troupe, and later secured employment at a hotel in Providence, R. I., where he now has the position of bookkeeper. A few days ago, in glancing over a Boston newspaper, he saw the name of F. F. Begg as a delegate from England to the Congress of Chambers of Commerce. Beck, who had changed his true name from Begg to Beck, suspected that the man was his brother, and going to Boston he found that it was really his brother, and that he was a member of the London Stock Exchange and London Chamber of Commerce. He also learned that his brother William was a member of the Australian Parliament, and that another brother was a physician in England. He learned of his father's death and of the large estate he had left, and that he himself had been given up for dead and had had no share in the division of the property. It is understood that his share of the estate, amounting to $400,000, will be given to him without contest. Those who are children of the heavenly Father, wherever they be scattered in the earth, have a right to the family heritage.

The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ. (Rom. 8: 16, 17.)

Footprints Convicted Him

HIS footprints in the dusty cover of a Bible sent William Hargraves to the penitentiary at Denton, Tex., the other day on the charge of burglary. He was sent to prison for two years. Hargraves robbed a store in Roanoke, Tex., in March last, and in the back of a Bible, printed in the dust, were the foot-marks made by a pair of shoes that the robber had purchased at the same store. The shoes so nearly fitted the marks that the jury convicted the prisoner. The Bible had dust on it. The store may have been a depository of the Bible Society, or the Book may have been kept for convenient reference or reading by the storekeeper; but it is evident that there was dust on the cover. There is a likelihood that disuse leaves the dust abundant opportunity to settle on the covers of God's Book. In some homes there is more dust on the Bible than on the deck of cards or games of amusement in the drawers under it. The Bible is an awful Nemesis. It has mercy for the penitent but no apology or toleration of anything that is wrong. It will be a severe witness against the persistent wrongdoer. Within it was written:

Thou shalt not steal. (Ex. 20: 15.)

Entire Company Accused

COURT-MARTIAL proceedings against the entire personnel of the Sixth Company of the First Foot Guards of Germany, including the captain, eleven non-commissioned officers and 110 men, are being held in Potsdam. The company is charged with cheating in connection with a target shooting competition for the coveted Kaiser prize of the Prussian army in August. The First Foot Guards is one of the proudest regiments of the household troops, and the Kaiser and all of his sons have at one time or another served in it. The Prussian army conditions for the shooting competition limited each man to thirty rounds of cartridges, but while the contest was in progress at the Döberitz camp an officer of another regiment noticed a private of the Sixth Company of Foot Guards put his hand into his boot and haversack and take cartridges out. A complaint was made by the officer to headquarters, and the shooting was immediately stopped. An investigation revealed the amazing fact that practically all the sergeants, corporals and men of the company were found to be in possession of many more cartridges than they were entitled to under the rules; that 1,700 cartridges were found secreted in boots, knapsacks, and parts of men's clothing to which they had no right. Few soldiers in the world have a keener sense of honor, and few by their ability, courage and integrity reflect greater glory upon their nation than those of the German army. The German sense of honesty will not look lightly upon any such cheating as is charged in the court-martial proceeding. A nation's greatness consists not in its territory, or army, or navy, but in its intellectual ability and its moral purity. In these regards Germany is a great empire. Moses makes this mention of the necessity of honesty to a healthy national life:

That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. (Deut. 16: 20.)

The Stingless Bee

SCIENCE is able to take the thorn from the blackberry bush, and now it has learned how to take the sting out of the bee. Mr. Burrows of Essex, England, after two years of experiments, claims to have obtained a species of bee which can be handled by a child in perfect safety. He mated the Cyprian drones and the Italian queens, the result being the production of harmless insects. They are splendid workers, and are said to be less liable to disease than the ordinary honey-gatherer. It appears that the new product has a sting, but it does not hurt, and is useless as a weapon of offense. Yet the bees die when they lose it. As civilization advances the sting will be taken out of men's disposition and lives, and under the triumphs of Christianity many of the pains that come to the bodies and souls of men by the stings of misfortune and sin will have been prevented. The virulence of the sting of the old-fashioned bee is thus referred to:

And the Amorites, which dwelt in that mountain, came out against you, and chased you, as bees do, and destroyed you in Seir, even unto Hormah. (Deut. 1: 44.)

Intemperate Soldiers Forfeit Pay

THE Army Appropriation Bill passed by the last Congress contains the provision that any officer or enlisted man who shall be absent from duty on account of disease resulting from his own intemperate use of drugs, or alcoholic liquors, or other misconduct, shall forfeit his pay for the period during which he is unable to perform his regular duties. Major General Leonard Wood, chief of staff of the army, accordingly the other day issued an order throughout the military service, requiring the enforcement of this new feature of the law. The War Department, and especially the Surgeon General, have been anxious to secure such legislation to reduce the amount of dissipation in the army. There is a concerted effort of many nations, especially of England and Germany, to reduce the alcoholism of their armies, and marked success has attended their efforts. We have an army and navy of splendid men physically and morally, and it is a wise and proper thing for the government to safeguard their character as far as possible by saying to its brave defenders:

And put a knife in thy throat, if thou be a man given to appetite. (Prov. 23: 12.)

LOOKING UP AND LIFTING UP

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

IT IS interesting to take a map of Palestine and trace the journey line of Jesus described in this lesson. He passed through Phœnicia on the borders of Tyre and Sidon. This may have been a walk along the shore of the Mediterranean Sea for twenty miles; then he traveled eastward and crossed two mountain ranges, Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and came to Decapolis, a region of ten cities, named by the historian Pliny as Scythopolis, Hippos, Gadara, Tella, Philadelphia, Gerasa, Dion, Canatha, Raphana and Damascus. We have no record that Jesus went into these cities, so are inclined to think that he visited only their borders. We do know, however, that the people of Decapolis were prepared for his coming, for when Jesus had healed the demoniac at Gadara, and he begged to go with him across the sea to Capernaum, Jesus had said to him, "Go to thy house unto thy friends and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee." Then it was that the man went his way and began to publish in Decapolis what Jesus had done for him.

The healed demoniac became a herald for Jesus. Doubtless some very interesting chapters might have been written about the ministry of Jesus in Decapolis. However, two interesting incidents are given: the healing of the deaf and dumb man very soon after Jesus entered Decapolis, at which the people were astonished beyond measure; and the feeding of the multitude of four thousand. We get some idea of the following Jesus must have had, when we read that Jesus had compassion on the people, because they had been listening to his teachings for three days, and had nothing to eat. They were very hungry, and Jesus, in compassion, determined to feed them. Very small was the stock in hand—seven loaves of bread and a few small, dried fishes. These the apostles had in their scrips (traveling bags or baskets). Surely there was not a crumb of bread or a morsel of fish for each person. But in the end there were seven large basketfuls gathered up by the apostles of broken pieces that remained when all had eaten and were satisfied. There was no fall of bread from heaven; but, in the loving hands of Jesus, after he had looked up to heaven and given thanks, the pieces multiplied until all were fed. Immediately after the feeding of the multitude, Jesus left Decapolis, and, with his apostles, crossed the Sea of Galilee and came to Dalmanutha, a town of southern Galilee. Possibly Jesus had found objectors even in Decapolis, which was, for the most part, inhabited by a heathen population.

This journey of Jesus certainly covered more than a hundred miles, which seemed all the longer for being taken on foot, and much of it mountain climbing, but from start to finish it was a succession of helpful and loving deeds. What a string of pearls we could make of them if we knew them all!

We do not need to go to Decapolis to look up and to lift up; we can do it right where we find ourselves, in whatever land, in whatever town. Christian Endeavor tells with wonderful clearness how we can do this: "The two characteristic postures of the Christian life are looking up and lifting up. It is even so. Aspiration and pity become natural and necessary to him who loves Christ. He learns to love that which is better than himself, and longs to be like the ideal which is presented to him. On the other hand, he likewise yearns to help those who are beneath him, and to spend himself, like his Master, in the service of the destitute. He is no longer self-centered, self-satisfied, self-reliant. He clings to One above, and reaches down to those below. It is the noblest life and the happiest.

CHRIST HEALING THE SICK

(From the painting by Hoffman)

And great multitudes came unto him, having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and cast them down at Jesus' feet; and he healed them. Matt. 15: 30

In this age there is a new industrialism, and there is being developed a new philanthropy—a scientific philanthropy, so to speak. The imitation of Christ in his giving of himself to the poor is increasingly needed. The social settlements and the unpaid "friendly visitors" of charity organization societies are tokens that at least a few of the Christian leaders of social reform appreciate that it is not sufficient to say: "Here is my check; send a city missionary to uplift the poor." Nothing will t[ake] the case but the noblesse oblige which is promp[ted] some of the wealthy, the cultured, the educate[d] say, "Here am I, send me." In his poor, Cl[rist] says to the rich, "I seek not yours, but you." V[ast] poverty needs more than money and charitable m[a]chinery is character, comfort, counsel, the upli[ft] brotherly friendship with stronger minds [and] hearts. The capitalist has hundreds, often t[hou]sands, of skilled brains to aid him in produc[tion] but seldom even one skilled assistant to [aid] him in the wise distribution of his we[alth]. One of the arguments against the undue [con]centration of wealth is that a millionaire [has] ten times as much to dispense as a man [with] $100,000 has even less time to consider ho[w it] can be used most wisely.

There are two ways of dispensing cha[rity]: one that pauperizes and degrades, and [the] other that uplifts. The first kind is illustr[ated] by the following incident: a lady used to [give] regularly ten cents a day to a poor b[lind] beggar that stood on a certain street cor[ner]. This became known to a gentleman, who [con]cluded to find out the history of the poor b[lind] man. He engaged a young man of his [ac]quaintance to follow him up. After begg[ing] all day on that corner, a woman came at [five] o'clock in the evening and led him many bl[ocks] until a certain gambling den was reac[hed], when two stout young men received the b[lind] man most graciously. They took his mo[ney] amounting to $14, and in return gave him f[ood] and lodging for that day only. The follow[ing] advertisement appeared in a newspaper: "[For] let, a beggar's stand in a good charit[able] neighborhood, bringing in about $7.50 a w[eek]. Some good will is required. N. B.—A dog [and] a blind man is to be disposed of."

In more than one city the problem of p[over]erty has been made worse by the establi[sh]ment of free lodging-houses and free lunc[h], so that both of these forms of relief have [met] with protest by the Conference of Charit[ies]. Charity should be dispensed in such a w[ay] that it will lift the poor out of the slough [of] despond up to the firm ground of self-h[elp]. In 1878 the City of Glasgow Bank failed, a[nd] by causing the closing of manufactur[ing] plants, cast hundreds out of work. It was a terrible winter. The ordinary labors of ch[arity] were increased tenfold. One mission[ary] was given $200 to distribute in his distr[ict]. He found that the most of it would be [ac]cepted only in loans, and in the course of a following year not less than $115 were rep[aid] to him after work had grown better. An American lady on a street in Rome bou[ght] some matches from a little match-vend[or]. They were wax matches in prettily decorated li[ttle] boxes. She handed the boy a five soldi piece, [and] expected to have two soldi in change, but the li[ttle] fellow shrugged his shoulders, and held the cha[nge] tightly in his hand, with a begging expression [on] his face, signifying that he wished to have it gi[ven] to him, whereupon a second American lady [who] was accompanying the first straightened hers[elf], looked intently at the boy, and said, "Mercante, [no] mendicante!" (you are a merchant, not a begga[r]. That was an appeal to the boy's self-respect, and t[he]

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—ONE OF THE teachers of this department was in Kentucky one Sunday. Her host said to her on Sunday morning, "Come and see this beautiful sight." It was a Sunday school of more than two hundred members, pouring out of the church next door into the street. "Excuse me," said the guest, "but I do not think that is a beautiful sight—a whole Sunday school turning its back on the church and going home at church time instead of remaining for church."

—MANY A PASTOR never fails to shake hands with the grown-ups at the close of church, but he would do better to put in his best handshaking at the door of the Sunday school, where he is losing his best material. It is the rule, and not the exception, for Sunday school classes, even of young people in the best of all periods for religious decision, the late 'teens, to go from Sunday school, not to church, but to the home or street.

—PASTORS AND SUPERINTENDENTS will get valuable pointers for work with boys from the best of the boy secretaries of the Y. M. C. A., and especially can they secure from them the best books on the boy problem as now interpreted by many helpful writers. Probably no one book will help more in the interpretation of boys psychologically than Boys' Life and Self-Government, by Professor George W. Fiske, of Oberlin, which is published by the Y. M. C. A.

—A GENERATION AGO, the chief motive appealed to in urging a religious life was the awful consequences of sin in the next world. There are other motives that modern teaching is now holding up as to the consequences of sin and the rewards of virtue in this world, and every Sunday school superintendent ought to be able to state these effectively to his boys, directly or through their teachers. These truths concerning impurity, intemperance, the tobacco habit, etc., ought to be stated not in mere assertions, but on scientific authority, with charts wherever possible. There is abundant material for making the wholesome fear of consequences of sin stronger than ever.

—THE MISTAKE OF THE hour in Sunday school management is the assumption that the so-called Sunday school is really a "school," and can do work in "school" fashion with only a tenth as much lesson time in a week as a public school has in a day. On the idea that the Sunday school is really a school, it is criticized for not giving children that complete knowledge of the Bible which they should get mostly at home, and reformers are attempting, by mere pedagogical methods, to make a half hour a week sufficient for the purpose of religious education. Far better to devote at least half their energy to awakening Christian homes to their duty. But the wide introduction of the new methods has not checked the decline of Sunday school attendance, nor increased its spiritual contribution to church membership.

—LET US RECALL that the name "Sunday school" is a relic of the days when Robert Raikes taught ragged boys and girls (who worked on other days) the rudiments of education, with the Bible for a reading book to give it a religious flavor. The "Sunday school"—which means the church at Bible study—should aim at conversion and character, using biography, history and geography only as Bible writers use them, incidentally and illustratively, in seeking to influence individuals and communities toward righteousness. E. L. Pell tells in his new book, Secrets of Sunday School Teaching, of a woman who "does not know pedagogy from a potato," yet "who trained more boys into Christian men than any teacher in the community." Let us improve our teaching intellectually, but hold to the spiritual aim.

—SOME GOOD HINTS about increasing Sunday school attendance are given in Secrets of Sunday School Teaching by Edward L. Pell. He does not favor contests for prizes, but rather a quiet plan, in charge of the assistant superintendent. A "Lookout Committee" of childr[en], he thinks, will find out quicker than any [one] that some new family has moved in or [a] boarder has arrived. These little sentin['els] 'phone to the assistant superintendent or [to] one of the membership committee of the [new] arrivals; and the latter get a prompt and tac[tful] invitation to join a suitable class. If it [is a] young man who is to be invited, the [best] young men in the school of his age and of [the] class he should join are chosen to make [the] call, and they do not give up if a single in[vi]tation is not effective. Boys are sent after [boys] and girls after girls, and ladies after little [girls].

—EVERY CONSIDERABLE city should have [a] yearly religious canvass, and if a force [is] arranged with a regular beat for each wo[rker] (not more than could be done in the leisur[e] one appointed week when all would be [at] about at the same time, with pupils and p[ar]notices to prepare a welcome) it would no[t be] a serious task. Why not, on such trips, or [at] afterward, have the same workers put [in] attractive leaflet in every home, so that [the] people who will not go to the church or Sun[day] school may get some message of truth? Be[st] if such door-to-door canvassing were a mon[thly] effort. Many would be won for Sunday sc[hool] and church by such a persistent campaign.

BY SHALLOW WATERS

BY MARGARET HORNER CLYDE

ILLUSTRATED BY H. T. FISK

T WAS the first day of summer vacation, and Mary Jane dangled a pair of very small new velvet pumps over the edge of the tiny bridge - and frowned at her own face in the water. It s not an altogether accurate mirror, since every ssing zephyr tended to wrinkle up one's nose and literate one's eyes altogether; but still it an- ered.

From the house across the road she could hear mother's thin voice, "Sammy, Sammy boy! O ry Jane, go find Sammy!" But Mary Jane ned a deaf ear. Had she not risen a half-hour rlier to-day, fried the eggs and the panful of tatoes, which formed the bulk of the family akfast, washed and dressed the plump but elu- e Sammy, rinsed and wiped the pile of dishes. d replaced them in the closet, all in order that her other might have each precious min- e to finish the minister's wife's Sun- y dress on time? No; her hard-earned ur of ease should not be interrupted. mmy, for all her, might "go hang."

So this, she reflected, was vacation; is early rising, this washing of babies d of crockery, this subordination of e's self to the demands of the sewing- achine that the village might rejoice new dresses to wear. A little rebel- us scowl darkened the face in the ter.

There was the minister's daughter o was going to the seashore for the nth of July. Somebody had invited r. And there was Letitia Brown, o was going to visit her grandmother, ich was almost half as good. To be re, Letitia's grandmother was not a rticularly festive-looking old lady, t even a visit to a grandmother is bet- than nothing. But most wonderful all, there was Margaret Craven, who s going in the fall to New York; and w York was to Mary Jane the key of world.

In that remarkable book called Geog- phy, which has somehow gotten into prosaic company of school-books, re were pictures of countries where roofs of the houses were fluted like ruffle of a dress, and of others where people wore rings in their noses and t much of anything anywhere else. ese countries, however, had seemed her not only queer but wholly ficti- us, until the day that she had made acquaintance of the gentleman on ge seventy-three. He had his sur- isingly long hair braided down his ck, wore what appeared to be the top lf of a suit of pajamas, and accord- g to the printed assurance was "cul- ating tea." Thereafter she never ted a cup of tea to her lips without a nd of reverence for it, and a feeling of btle kinship to the man who lived for- er on the next page to the map of ina.

But there were other countries less rtling which called one even more ir- sistibly. There was England, for in- ance, where by gently flowing streams e massive buildings, bigger even, she pposed, than the new creamery down the railroad, and yet so built that eir spires looked like lace-work ainst the sky. There was Italy, which e knew about best of all, because a summer arder who came to the house one day on the mat- of a new lace yoke had told her about it. And e had shown her a picture of a place there called iples, where the sky was just the color of young rs. Stiles's blue silk wedding dress.

But to get to any one of these countries one must to New York first. Even though she knew it is absurd, she could not quite banish the idea that e might stand upon the shore there, and with a ass make out—very dimly, of course—on the ner side of the water, the canal-veined flats of olland, or the snowy heights of Switzerland. ien one would only need to say, "I'll choose—well, rance, this time—page 41"—and start. Perhaps paying a little more, one might—though of urse one would never want to—choose the North the South Pole.

However, this was all very unprofitable business, is thing of gazing at one's face in the water and nversing with one's self about the delightful ings that other people were on the point of doing. ary Jane therefore lifted her head and, as it were, turned her back upon her reflections, both mental and physical. Then she opened the big square box by her side and began sewing industriously.

Now, at sixteen, especially when seventeen is not far away, one has no moral right to a doll. Therefore Mary Jane kept hers sedulously concealed at the bottom of the box. Nevertheless it was unmistakably a doll's dress she was fashioning, and Mary Jane's doll dresses had long been famous. By the time her baby fingers could thread a needle she had made little aprons and little cloaks, and now it was nothing for her to build an evening gown that would have done credit to Worth. To be sure, a pearl garniture is a little difficult to manage out of glass beads surreptitiously appropriated from the fringe of the pincushion in the spare bedroom. But still it can be done. And there was always a bit of lace or a scrap of silk to be found in the rag bag for the crowning touch. There are advantages after all in having the village dressmaker for a mother.

"Good morning. A hot day, isn't it?"

To-day the dilapidated doll was to be transformed into a trained nurse, like the one who had arrived at Miss Tillie Major's last week in the first relay of summer boarders. Mary Jane had walked casually past Miss Tillie's porch that same afternoon, and had lost no detail of dress in the frail old lady in a lace shawl, or the robust young person in cap and apron who attended her. It was Mary Jane's first opportunity to inspect a real trained nurse at close range, and she had immediately determined that the half yard of chambray left from Marjorie Page's last school dress would answer excellently for a nurse's gown, while the cap and apron need be nothing but humble white muslin.

This morning, sitting beneath the quivering willows, with the stream singing under her feet, she cut and sewed and fitted as if her life depended on it. She was so absorbed that she did not even hear the creaking of the bridge until a footstep sounded close beside her and she looked up startled into the eyes of a very young man.

"Good morning. A hot day, isn't it?" was his highly original greeting.

Mary Jane nodded, but began tumbling scissors and spools indiscriminately into the box preparatory to flight.

"I wonder," he went on pleasantly, "if I couldn't get a drink here." He clambered easily down the bank, and balancing himself upon a jutting willow root, stooped and caught a handful of the sparkling water. The girl watched him intently as he drank and drank again; then she turned cautiously to his suit-case standing temptingly near her. "G. A. P.," she whispered curiously. "Gap; what's that for?" But a neat card fastened close to the handle proved more illuminating. "Guy A. Pearce, New York City." So that was his name, and he lived in New York.

By this time Mr. Guy A. Pearce had climbed up the bank again, had seated himself on the edge of the bridge beside her, swinging his long legs over the water, and was smiling at her in the friendliest manner. "You live here?" he inquired.

"Yes, sir," she answered primly. She was fascinated by the strangeness of him, but she was still poised for flight.

"Do the people here like pictures?" he pursued.

"What kind of pictures?"

For answer he opened his suit-case and showed her piles of stereoscope views. For Mr. Guy A. Pearce was none other than one of that noble band of college students, who, each summer, supply to a thirsting public—for a consideration—the pictured beauties of Niagara and the Yosemite Valley.

"My!" exclaimed Mary Jane, breathless with interest. "Do you sell them?"

"I hope so. I haven't sold any yet. I've just started out. This is the first town I've struck."

"Well, I hope you'll have good luck."

"I hope so, though I can't for the life of me see why people should care any more about buying than I do about selling."

"You don't?" She withdrew her eyes from the Grand Cañon of Arizona and gave him a look of amazement. "Why, I think they're beautiful!"

"Maybe they are," he assented. "But what I had in my mind was, this is such a queer thing for me to be doing. I've never sold anything to anybody in my life. I wouldn't be doing it now only the governor says every fellow ought to know the value of money. And I'm not to have a penny this summer outside of what I earn."

"The governor! Do you mean the governor of the State?"

The young man was conscious of an inward convulsion. But he was a well-bred youth. He turned to the girl beside him a perfectly grave face. "No," he explained, "I meant my dad."

"Oh," returned Mary Jane briefly.

The cover of the white box stood a little askew. Beneath it the blue dress and the white apron of the trained nurse were visible. "Is that your doll?" he questioned.

The girl's face flamed angrily. "I don't play with dolls," she announced with dignity.

"I should think any one might play with this one," he said. "She's the real thing, isn't she?" He turned the nurse about critically, smoothing her apron with appreciative fingers. "Looks just ready to put a thermometer under your tongue."

Mary Jane said nothing. Her brief and healthy life had afforded her no experience of thermometers under the tongue.

"My sister," he went on, "tried everywhere to buy a nurse doll for my little niece last Christmas. Had to give it up and dress one herself."

"I could have done it for her if I'd known."

"You don't mean to say you dressed this one yourself?"

"Oh, yes," she answered loftily. "I make a great many dolls' dresses for the children."

"Say," he proposed, "why don't you send 'em to New York to the Woman's Exchange?"

"I don't know what a Woman's Exchange is," she returned frankly.

"Oh," he answered vaguely, "it's a place where people send things to be sold. My sister could tell you all about it."

"Does it cost much to send things there?" she questioned. "Because mamma can't give me any money hardly since papa died. She says it's all she can do to pay the rent and buy what we need to eat. And we do eat so much." She sighed.

"I suppose," she continued, "that's partly because Sammy's growing so. Why, do you know, in the fall Sammy will have to go into pants."

Her companion received the news sympathetically.

"It takes an awful lot of money to live," she said sadly.

The young man regarded her steadily. There was a new look of thoughtfulness in his boyish eyes. There was compassion there too. "I know," he assented—though he didn't know at all—"it's a tough world."

Then brightening, "I'll tell you what. You let me take this doll along with me. I'll send it to my sister and we'll see what she says about selling it."

"Very well," agreed the girl in her most business-like tone. "Only," she realized, "they won't want my poor old doll."

"Never mind. They'll want the costume, I guess."

Mary Jane gathered the stereoscopic views into her hand and rose with decision. Then, her old primness coming back, "Thank you," she said shyly, "for letting me see the pictures."

"Say," he suggested, "don't you want to keep 'em? I'll take the doll in payment."

"Oh, could you—would you—that is, would it be right?"

"Sure," he answered cheerfully. "And whatever money is coming to you over and above the price of the stereoscope, I'll send you when the doll is sold. You just write your name on this card."

So Mary Jane took his proffered fountain-pen, and wrote neatly in her round schoolgirlish hand her complete address. Then the old doll in uniform went into the suit-case, and its owner returned to her home in proud possession of the natural wonders of America, and the stereoscope wherewith to view them. The village dressmaker looked up from her sewing with a worried air as her daughter entered the room. "Did you find Sammy?" she asked nervously.

"No, I found something better than Sammy," answered Mary Jane.

This brought a puzzled look to the near-sighted blue eyes, which gave way the next moment to relief, as Sammy, smiling and begrimed, toddled into the doorway.

She never had succeeded—this toiling seamstress—in comprehending her daughter. Of late she did not even try. She simply accounted for all eccentricities by saying that the child "took after her pa," and Mary Jane's "pa," she would have you know, was a gentleman.

She had known it the day he had strolled, debonair, from the unknown outside world into her life; she had been equally convinced of it the day she had followed him, in the widow's mourning she was almost too poor to buy, to his grave.

During the intervening years she had faded from a pink and white apple-blossom of a girl to a care-worn woman, but no stress of hardship could quench the conviction of her soul that she had married well. She would have maintained against the world—if it had been called for—that her husband was a gentleman. But who, indeed, questioned it? Had he not kept his hands smooth and white at the expense of her labor? Had he not graciously allowed her to clothe and feed him through long years of toil when his easel and brushes had produced nothing but acres of unsalable canvases?

Mary Jane put the stereoscope and the views upon the center-table in the darkened parlor and set about preparing dinner. At her first leisure moment in the afternoon she slipped off to her room and locked the door. The small blotched mirror over the bureau was perhaps hardly more accurate than the brook, but it was at least steadier. She sat long before it, drawing the comb through her abundant hair. Then she piled the shining mass high upon her head. The little tendrils that escaped she brushed carefully around her finger, turning her head that she might see how lovingly they clung to her plump white neck. Slipping into her longest white dress, the one with the short sleeves that showed her dimpled elbows, she sat down again before the mirror. "Now, then, Marie," she challenged, for Mary Jane in the privacy of her own soul was never Mary Jane. And the face in the mirror accepted the challenge proudly.

It was a breathless moment, as it always is in a girl's experience; for the first putting up of one's hair is not so much a physical as a psychological phenomenon. The girl who had talked with her own reflection in the water that morning was not the girl who now faced herself in the glass. Her whole outlook upon life had changed. It was no longer the world as related to Mary Jane. It was Mary Jane as related to the world.

Toward the end of summer there came an express package and also a letter, which the girl ran all the way home from the post office to read in the privacy of her own room. It bore her name in tall pointed characters, and smelled of violets. It began: "My dear Mary Jane: My brother has told me—" and ended, "Your interested friend, HELEN PEARCE."

It was some time before she was calm enough to comprehend what came between. "I am sending you back," the letter ran, "your own doll. The nurse's uniform is charming. It sold for $10, and with the money I have bought three new dolls for you to dress. I hope you will approve of this. My friends are delighted with your work, and already these three are engaged for Christmas. How about a little Dutch maiden for one, and a Tyrolese peasant for another? I am sending you pictures from the magazines to copy. As for the other, use your own judgment. And if you need materials, write to me and I'll buy and send them to you on account."

"On account of what, I wonder," deliberated Mary Jane. But she did not deliberate long. She was soon at work planning and cutting and sewing.

The little Dutch maiden and the Tyrolese peasant but headed a long procession of dolls which made their way to New York from time to time throughout the winter. And despite the occasional demands upon her money for fabrics not obtainable in the village, the checks which came steadily grew in size.

"If it will not be too much trouble, please send me some more magazines," had been one of her first requests. In this way she had been kept supplied with models for her work. She copied everything she saw. Historical articles, travel sketches and stories, she read with avidity, and straightway the pictures illustrating them were reproduced in silks or muslins. She had a catholic taste and was absolutely impartial. Charlotte Corday and Evangeline went to the city in the same box, with a Turkish peasant girl to keep them company.

'Do you know," reflected Miss len Pearce, on one of her visits to e Woman's Exchange, "that girl is genius." She was finger ng, as she oke, a bit of exquisite hand embroid- carefully fitted about the neck of French doll. The gowns she de- ns are really beautiful."

'And so young, you say," replied rs. Worthington, gathering the rich ck folds of her skirt into her jew- d fingers. They were the only sign e gave—those diamonds—of light- ng the heavy mourning she had rn for five years.

'Just seventeen."

'My Mary would have been just a le over seventeen." She sighed as e stepped into the street and di- ted her chauffeur to drive her back the big desolate house she called me.

When summer had come again, there ne also to the village the usual sum- r boarders. Among them this time s Mrs. Worthington. "I know it's surd," she confided to Helen Pearce, ut I want to have a look at the ild. A week there won't hurt me yhow. I was born in the same inty."

Mary Jane had by this time accu- ulated a bank account. Her first eck she had filially placed in her other's hands. "There," she said, hat'll help pay the rent." But Mary ne's mother had at that moment the e inspiration of her dull life. "No, ild," she answered, "you keep it. e'll get along. Maybe it'll help you something better than your moth- s ever had." And Mary Jane had oped impulsively and kissed the inkled forehead.

The faded face had flushed with easure. "There, child," she said, ou'd ought to have it yourself. u deserve it. I've always said ere's nobody had a better daughter an me." For not all her years of l had quenched her mother love, if ey had tended to relax her hold upon e proprieties of the English lan- age.

Mrs. Worthington speedily made e acquaintance of Mary Jane. "My ar Helen," she wrote some days er, "the child is not only a genius, e is on the point of becoming a auty. But fortunately she doesn't ow that." In which statement Mrs. orthington was entirely mistaken. ary Jane knew it perfectly. Only e was too busy at present to think ry much about it. Still the same nd of care which she bestowed on e adoring doll, she bestowed also on r own hair and hands and dress, not cause she loved Mary Jane inordi- tely, but because she loved beauty. In September Mrs. Worthington re- rned to her silent home, but it prom- ed to be no longer silent, for Mary ne, fairly bubbling over with eager- ss, was with her. She was going to hool, as all the village knew, to udy designing, and she was to live th Mrs. Worthington.

New York, that Mecca of her eams, at last rose before her. Any- ing seemed possible now. "Do you ow," she confided to Helen Pearce, o was lunching with Mrs. Worth- gton the next day, "there's one thing I like to see first of all—a big ship, ship that's been—oh, everywhere. ' she added ruefully, "have never en anywhere."

The young lady opposite her ughed. Then, "You poor child," she id, "you shall see one to-morrow—a ry big one. I'll take you with me meet my father and brother, who e arriving on the Olympic." For Mr. y A. Pearce, now burdened with a and new university degree, had not ent his summer this year in intro- cing to the rural districts the scenic andeur of America. He had been road with "the governor."

Standing wide-eyed and speechless beside Helen the next day, Mary Jane could yet scarcely keep her feet from dancing. This great vessel had bridged the chasm between her and those fascinating lands beyond. This hurrying throng of people had looked with their own eyes upon the cathedral spires of England and the poplar rows of France. Her mind became a blur of foreign forms and faces, out of which stood distinctly her old friend on page seventy-three, with his pigtail and his blouse, patiently and forever "cultivating tea."

The next instant the blur faded and she found herself being introduced to a tall and commanding gentleman with kindly but quizzical eyes. This could be none other than "the governor." She was rather embarrassed and the color flew to her face. Then she heard a familiar voice behind him saying succinctly, "Well, if it isn't Mary Jane!"
